Dear Mr. Vining:

Yesterday brought the finale to one of the most unusual tragedies which San Francisco has witnessed in many years. Wally, the giant single-tusked bull elephant at the Fleishhacker Zoo last Tuesday gored and trampled to death his keeper, Edward Brown. Wally was a six-ton, twenty-two year old king of the jungle, captured and brought to this country by Frank Buck, did the rounds with Al G. Barnes' circus before being featured with Wallace Beery in "The Champ". The Barnes' Circus, finding Wally unreliable and temperamental and often irritable gave him to the local Zoo, where he has been a model inmate housed with three smaller elephants of opposite sex. It was mating season at the Zoo, and Wally was making improper advances toward Babe, his favorite cow-elephant, when Mr. Brown tried to depart them. The end was inevitable. Trumpeting his savage defiance, Wally turned on Keeper Brown, seized him with his mighty trunk, repeatedly battering him against the concrete corral, tramping and goring him until his body was broken and mangled beyond recognition. Nearby keepers and zoo attendants, hearing Brown's screams rushed to the scene where they finally after much struggling and fright managed to chain Wally by front and rear feet to the concrete pillars. Wally's continuous trumpeting and the odor of human blood caused a terrific upheaval
