London Letter No. 15

August 12th.
Dear Mr Vining,

Today is the Glorious Twelfth, that day when all our noble sports men, frustrated for many months from killing anything except an occasional fish or rabbit, rush wildly out onto the moors, whooping with joy like released prisoners, to slaughter their first grouse. Their wives are with them too, wearing their new tweed coats and skirts, and eyeing the tweeds of others with envy or disdain as the case may be.

So London, you see, is empty---empty that is in the social sense. Actually it is a whirl of people, of bumpkins up from the country, and tourists of every nationality, shape, and size. This has been a marvellous year for tourists, and tradesmen and hoteliers have done a roaring business. I can only hope that they have made their fortunes, as I am quite certain nobody will ever come here again! The English weather has surpassed itself for filthiness, the sun shining fitfully one day a week at the most---really very disheartening.

London looks stale and ugly this month. She is not at her best in August, with her polyglot crowds, her streets torn up, and a general look of fatigue on her grey face.

Mr and Mrs Walter Hill's daughter, Barbara, arrives today from Paris, and I am much looking forward to meeting her---that is to say if I do meet her. As we have never seen each other, instinct
