

Have you ever been hard pressed, soft soaped, completely washed out, then had your sleeves pulled, your pockets picked and hung up completely dry cleaned? That's what happens to clothes sent to Rector's Laundry, and if you could look as well as the clothes do after being put through the works you would want all those things done to you.

Rector's Laundry has installed thousands of dollars worth of modern machinery within the past few months in order to take care of its increasing laundry business and to do it better. A new machine recently installed washes feather pillows and mattresses. They are placed in a revolving oven and gently dropped back and forth until thoroughly cleaned, and gently finished without having to be ironed. Turkish towels, and velvet looking clothes that can't be ironed as sheets and smooth finished material, are put in this oven and made to look as if they were new ones. Another machine that resembles an old time hitching post irons collars. It is small at the top to fit a baby's neck and gets larger at the bottom to fit the neck of the largest man in the world. Another new machine presses trousers and suits almost with one movement and another does up shirts in the latest manner. Some delicate material is still finished by hand. With all this new special machinery the room is still full of efficient women each a specialist in her line, doing certain parts of the work, sorting, washing, ironing, wrapping, etc. Rector's Laundry is a big asset to the community. It gives its customers better service for their money and furnishes employment to a large number of workers.—Ad.
