Landrum Service Station Owner Is Fatally Shot

J. S. Dean, 49, Landrum service station operator and oil dealer, died at the Spartanburg General hospital late Tuesday afternoon a few minutes after he was admitted to the institution suffering from a small-calibre bullet wound in the head which investigating officers reported was accidentally inflicted.

The accident occurred on the Gramling-Holly Springs road only a few hundred yards from the town of Gramling about 5 o'clock yesterday.

Investigating officers immediately went to the scene and later reported that the shooting took place as Mr. Dean stood beside his tank-truck parked on the side of the road, apparently engaged in refilling the empty gasoline tank of the vehicle.

A five-gallon tin of gasoline and a small funnel bore mute testimony as to the task in which he was engaged, it was said by Deputy Sheriff B. B. Brockman, one of the investigating officers.

It was thought that in raising the seat of the truck in order to get access to the gas tank underneath, Mr. Dean in some manner fired a .22 rifle which he habitually carried upright behind the truck's seat, the officer continued.

As the gun discharged, Mr. Dean suffered a bullet wound in the right temple.—Spartanburg Herald
