Food for War Sufferers

The following clipping from the editorial page of Saturday's Christian Science Monitor, an international newspaper, printed in Boston, will be of interest to readers of the Bulletin:

"To The Christian Science Monitor:

"As America wakes up, we find there are so many ways in which most of us can help not only ourselves to defend ourselves and our ideals, but there are many, many ways we can help our brothers overseas who are bearing the brunt of the present attack upon human liberties and rights. May I tell the Monitor readers of one way that is being worked out in a very wide awake, progressive little town near here—Tryon, North Carolina?

"In Tryon there is a regular town meeting, after the pattern of the New England town meetings, where anybody can say what he thinks, and where local problems can be worked out in unison. At a recent town meeting the people of Tryon decided to establish 'war acres', as an effectual help towards meeting the food shortage which may last a long time after the fighting is over. Everyone who has room for a garden—large or small—is setting aside a plot, anywhere from a few yards to a few acres, on which to raise food for war sufferers. There will also be a community cannery, operated by volunteers, where quantities of food can be preserved in shape for shipping anywhere.
