Our London Letter

Dear Mr. Vining,

Well, we know where we are now! And although facing heavy odds and unknown dangers, we are not unmindful of our blessings. All our sons, husbands, and lovers are gathered together in this small island, and as near to them as they can reasonably get nestle the mothers, wives and sweethearts. No more sea separating us, no more prisoners of war or missing to be waited for—we are all in the front line of the battle—men, women and children.

That France should now have gone seems almost unbelievable. For weeks we heard rumors that she would be forced to lay down her arms, but in our hearts we thought she would fight until not a man was left standing, and the news came as a great shock. This evening I expect, we shall hear the terms of the armistice—the poor French, how inconceivably awful for them.

We have had two successive nights of raids, but amazingly little damage was done considering the number of planes said to be involved. Long may this state of affairs continue.

I am leaving London, which really breaks my heart, as my husband is stationed in the west country and I want to be as near to him as possible. So down come the curtains, and off come the covers and up go the shutters. Very depressing.

The weather continues beautiful. Nobody can remember such a gorgeous summer—sunny days and hot, too hot, and flowers and fruit
