Our London Letter

July 19th, 1940.

Dear Mr. Vining,

I fear I have been dilatory in writing, but you know, or rather you don't know thank heavens, what it is!

In this particular spot, where I have followed my husband we have on an average three air raids every day and three every night. We are so unired to them now, that we hardly lift our heads when we hear the warning siren, but automatically stop whatever we are doing and trail away to some cellar. The boredom of having to sit in cellars for several hours every day is acute, but I dare say when and if the big waves come over, we shall be glad of them. The raids, so far, have done surprisingly little damage, and the Germans are adept at dropping their bombs in the middle of fields. Long may they do so!

The project of sending children over to the States has been regretfully abandoned, as we cannot spare the ships and convoy them. Some people think it is a good thing, and that families ought to stay together regardless of the dangers. A lot of arguing goes on about this, and you would have pitied the distraught mothers who have been trying to make up their minds. If they take their children they must leave their husbands, and then they can't get back again. Also, the problem of money crops up. How can you expect an American, however much a friend he is, to pay for your offspring for the duration, for no money must leave this country. Surely, some
