NOTES ON PROGRESS IN DEFENSE

The Democratic machine, like the "mills of the gods," grinds slowly but hopefully, and it begins to look as if the President's lend-lease bill will soon become a reality. The opposition has simmered down, and the hot air floating around the Capital is somewhat drier in quality, more like the air of Tryon. The opposers who have opposed chiefly for the sake of argument have been duly answered.

The faithful "editor of news", Kaltenborn, was helpful in a recent broadcast when he pointed out that most of the powers asked for were in fact already possessed by any President of the United States, and had been duly exercised by many of them in sending out armed forces to Mexico and various places to settle affairs that needed military backing.

Any one desiring to read the lend-lease bill in full will find a copy at the Mountain Industries, on South Trade street, also a summary of it by Livingston Hartley. But it should be sufficient for most of us, if we really have faith in our Government, to read the report in the papers of the Foreign Relations Committee, who have made their examinations painstaking and thorough, patiently hearing testimony that often seemed unnecessary since the bill had been carefully prepared to meet the shock of all the objectors. Wouldn't it be a fine gesture toward these really serious men to express a little more
