BRAZILIAN LETTER

Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

August 31st, 1942.

Dear Mr. Vining:

My last letter to you was ten days ago. Brazil was not yet in war! It was not much of a surprise, although we expected to read of it the day after the ships were sunk. All leaves were cancelled and reservists called up however, and I recalled only too well these symptoms of war that I had witnessed in 1939. On the twenty-first all the Axis help was fired from our hotel. It was at lunch on the twenty-second, before the news was printed that we knew Brazil was at war. Our waiter had informed us! He had the same look of fury I had seen in the eyes of the French waiter in France three years ago. This Brazilian waiter is of the 1910 class and is waiting to be called up. "It pleases me very much to be a patriot", he told me.

Indeed, there is a general feeling of patriotism such as I would never have believed. These people up to the day of those sinkings of their ships had been so quiet and happy-go-lucky. But underneath the spirit of the Duke of Caxias, the Marshall, pacificator, unificator of Brazil, and founder of the national unity is deep in every true Brazilian's heart. This week the celebration of the centenary of this great man's work seems more pertinent because Brazil is now confronted again by a grave outside menace against which her primary weapon is the spirit, the nationalism of her people.
