

Be sure leather gloves are labelled "washable" before trying to wash them at home, clothing specialists caution. Many gloves of suede, doeskin, capeskin and pigskin are finished so that they can be washed and are labelled accordingly on the inside.

Use mild soapsuds and lukewarm water when washing leather gloves. An easy way to do it is to put the gloves on and then wash them like the hands, lathering the entire surface and using a soft brush on fingertips and other specially soiled places.

Pull gloves off the hands carefully because leather is weak when wet. Rinse by running lukewarm water into each glove to push it gently into shape. Never wring or scrub gloves because this stretches and may tear the wet leather. To keep pigskin gloves soft, rinse in water to which a couple of drops of glycerine have been added.

Dry slowly in room temperatures. Too much heat is harmful to leather.

Mend snags or worn places in towels before they go into the wash to avoid further tearing. If the selvage shows wear, check fraying by taking several rows of stitches along the edge to strengthen it.
