FLOWERING MOVES TO HIGHER N. C. PEAKS

Asheville, N. C.—The purple rhododendron and flame azalea flowering show is coming in at higher elevations of the Blue Ridge and Great Smoky Mountains and is expected to be good at various points until the end of the month.

At Craggy Gardens, more than a mile high along the Blue Ridge Parkway north of Asheville, purple rhododendron is in good bloom now, with the peak predicted for the week of June 14th. The display is expected to be good until June 20.

The peak of flame azalea and mountain laurel between Bee Tree Gap and Balsam Gap along the Parkway is expected also the week-end of the 14th.

In the Pisgah National Forest north of Black Mountain Gap, mountain laurel is at its height, with a good show expected through the week-end of the 14th. The flame azalea peak is predicted for June 12-20.

In the Smokies, good blooming of purple rhododendron is looked for the week of June 15th at elevations above 5,000 feet, with the peak expected about June 22. Mountain laurel and flame azalea are good now at elevations between 3,000 and 4,000 feet, and are expected to reach their height at higher levels between June 20 and 25. The heaviest concentration of flame azalea may be seen at Andrews Bald just below Clingman's Dome.

Average per capita consumption of fluid milk by all North Carolina civilians is about 93 per cent of that of all United States civilians.
