"Cancer and Gemini"

By Tim Linder

The area of sky around Cancer and Gemini contains a variety of interesting objects. In this area are open star clusters, a planetary nebula, double stars, and variable stars. Below is a description of each of the objects in the Cancer-Gemini region and the accompanying star map will help in locating these objects.

M 35 is an open star cluster of magnitude 5. M 35 is at the foot of Gemini and is a beautiful object for binoculars. On a very clear night you might even glimpse M 35 with the naked eye.

NGC 2392 is of magnitude 9 and is on the south side of Gemini. NGC 2392 is also known as the Eskimo Nebula. A telescope is needed to locate this object and at magnification of about 45x NGC 2392 will appear as a very small fuzzy patch of light.

M 44 is one of the more well known of open star clusters. This cluster, also known as the Beehive cluster, is of magnitude 4 and can be seen easily with the naked eye. Look for a bright fuzzy spot between the stars Delta and Gamma in the constellation of Cancer.

M 67 is also in the constellation of Cancer and is of magnitude 6. Binoculars will be needed to find this open star cluster which is about 8 degrees southeast of M 44.

The star Castor in Gemini is a double star. A small telescope will resolve this star into its two components which are of magnitudes 2 and 2.8.

The stars A and B on the star map are both variable stars. Star A, which is Eta Geminorum, changes from magnitude 3.1 to 3.9 and back again over a period of 234 days. Star B, which is Zeta Geminorum, changes from magnitude 3.7 to 4.1 and back again over a period of just over 10 days.

ACCURATE CLOCK

Scientists at Johns Hopkins University Applied Physics Laboratory have developed a clock that can measure time to a trillionth of a second and remain accurate to a millionth of a second over three years. The clock takes the form of a hydrogen maser, a device that measures time from energy emitted by stimulated hydrogen atoms.
