Weather Tuesday: high 73, low 60, rain .05; rain at 6 a.m. Wednesday was 1.96 inches. Wednesday morning was perfect. The air was cool and clean, and the sun was shining brightly.

Geologists warned 50,000 residents of two small cities in Washington Tuesday, that a lake created by mud and debris from erupting Mount St. Helens could go cascading down the mountain at any time.

Volcanic ash from Mount St. Helens could plunder America's bread and fruit baskets. The geologists told Agriculture Secretary Bob Bergland that 2 inches of dust already cover the wheat fields of Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming and part of North Dakota. Four to 5 inches, they speculated, would destroy the wheat crops in those states and damage the Canadian breakfast provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Also immediate concern was the fruit trees in the Pacific Northwest, covered with 2 to 3 inches of volcanic dust. A light rain would create sulfuric acid from the dust and the acid would destroy this year's fruit crop and many trees.

Quebec voters decided Tuesday that they didn't want to move
