After Election Day

Most people realize that in a democracy, Election Day is one of the most important days in the year.

But there are other days just as important, although they get little attention. Those are the days immediately after Election Day.

That's the time that separates those who really believe in democracy from those who merely give it lip service for a short time.

That's the time when the losers must be willing to go along with the will of majority, at least until next election.

It is this willingness to abide by majority rule that separates America from so many other nations that have tried to be democracies in the past 200 years...and failed.

In all-too-many of those nations, the losers, on the day after Election Day, picked up their guns and started shooting, instead of abiding by the outcome of the election. And the winners acted like tyrants instead of representatives of all the people.

This is the basic reason so few democracies succeed...a fact we too should pause to remember in the days ahead, as a new administration takes office. — WRAL-TV Editorial
