Water Smells In Columbus

Water users of the Town of Columbus began noticing something strange about their water last Thursday. Some thought that it smelled and tasted a little like kerosene. Upon investigation, the city officials found that the trouble came from White Oak Mountain where a section of the road is being paved.

Columbus Water Superintendent Ronnie Pack stated Friday morning that the men at the paving site said that one of the hoses on the truck had burst and some of the spill had gone into the creek. Mr. Pack said that there were crews cleaning up the spill and that the water had been tested by the State and found safe to drink. He said that the water plant at Columbus had stopped taking in water until it cleared up, but that there probably would be a slight smell for several days.
