Nurse To Retire From Hospice

"I have been a nurse for 50 years. Those not familiar with hospice work may question the personal satisfaction of caring for the terminally ill, but I have found it to be the most rewarding of all of my years of nursing. I intend to remain involved with Hospice even after I resign from my position of patient-care coordinator."

This was said by Julia Seelow to Jean Eckert, executive director of Hospice. As this position is essential to the Hospice program, Mrs. Eckert will be looking for a registered nurse to succeed Mrs. Seelow. An ad appears in this paper.

The patient-care coordinator works closely with the Hospice medical director in assessing the needs of patients and, as the job title implies, advises staff and volunteers on the providing of care and comfort for patients in their homes. She herself makes visits to the homes. She also keeps certain required records.

A typical Hospice situation is a "family" made up of the patient and the caregivers, the staff and the volunteers. Dignity and comfort are the needs of the patient. Understanding and patience are the needs of the caregivers. This team endeavors
