eclipsed sun is INDIRECTLY and there are several ways to do this. The first method of projecting the sun's image is to construct a "pinhole camera". To do this you will need two index cards and a pin. Using the pin, punch a small hole on one of the index cards. Then hold this card about 8-10 inches above the second card so that the light from the sun shines down through the hole, projecting an image of the sun onto the second card. The image will be small but should be of sufficient size for you to view all phases of the eclipse.

Another variation of the pinhole camera is to simply look beneath a bush or small tree. Sunlight filtering down between the leaves of the tree or bush will produce many tiny images of the sun on the ground below. It might help to place a piece of posterboard beneath the tree or bush so that the images of the sun may be seen more clearly.

Another method of projecting the sun's image requires a telescope or pair of tripod-mounted binoculars. DO NOT LOOK AT THE SUN THROUGH THE BINOCULARS, THE TELESCOPE OR THE TELESCOPE FINDERSCOPE. Point the telescope or binoculars at the sun while holding a piece of white paper or posterboard two or three feet behind the eyepiece (if using binoculars, cover on lens). The sun's light will pass through the binoculars or telescope which will project an image of the sun 8-12 inches across onto the posterboard. Move the posterboard closer to or farther from the eyepiece to obtain the clearest image of the sun. A third way to project the sun's image requires a small mirror. Almost any kind will do. Using a piece of paper or posterboard, cover all the mirror except a small hold about the size of a dime. Now set the mirror up somewhere so that the sun's light is reflected from the small uncovered part of the mirror onto a piece of posterboard several feet away. This should produce an image of the sun one or two inches across (depending on how close the mirror is to the posterboard.) The best image will be obtained by setting up somewhere where the mirror is in sunlight while the posterboard is in the shade. DO NOT LOOK AT THE SUN'S REFLECTION IN THE MIRROR.

There are several other widely used methods of viewing the sun that are UNSAFE. NEVER USE: welder's glass, exposed film, sunglasses or smoked glass. Viewing an eclipse directly should be done only by or with the aid of experienced amateur or professional astronomers.

Using one of the above methods of projecting the sun's image, you should now be ready to view this weeks solar eclipse... weather permitting!!!
