whole classes "adopting" each other. They visit nursing homes to stage programs, and take part in assembly programs as well as original dance productions for the public.

Parents turn up at all hours, working with their children in evening "Family Math" ses-sions, celebrating "100's Days" with the first grade, having morning "Coffee With the Prin-cipal," or flocking to "Dad's (or Mom's) Night."

Responding to invitations to speak, Principal Howell and his teachers have been "presenters" during the past three months at conferences around the state. In December, they discussed "Family Math" at a regional workshop for 350 volunteers at Lake Junaluska. On February 25-26, they described their concept of "accelerated learning" at the State Awareness Conference in Winston-Salem. On February 27, they spoke about their program at the NCAE Winter Instructional Conference in Raleigh. Visitors to Mill Spring invariably notice an air of expectancy in the school, where it seems that something wonderful is always about to happen. "Visitors from other school systems want to know why our teachers are so excited about what they arc doing," says Principal Howell.

On March 3, nine teachers and administrators from Ira B. Jones Elementary in Asheville, where the curriculum is being restruc-tured, came to Mill Spring to find ways of building and maintaining teacher morale. On March 10, three teachers from Winterfield Elementary in Charlotte-Mecklenburg, а school which is adding grades 4-6 next year, visited the fifth and sixth grade classrooms to see how Mill Spring teachers handle the middle grades.

On March 19, 24 teachers and administrators from Lingerfeldt Elementary School in Gaston County spent a day examining Mill Spring classrooms, talking with teachers, and observing classes. Mill Spring is now an official stop on the Spring Tour of the North Carolina Teaching Fellows Program.

Despite their success with "accelerated learning," the teachers at Mill Spring are looking forward to moving with the Green Creek faculty this summer to a new, consolidated elementary school at the site of Polk Central.

In anticipation of the "outcome-based" education program adopted this past year by the school system, three Mill Spring teachers have applied to the Polk County Community Foundation for a Slater Grant to visit an Arizona school system where the "outcome based" approach is already working in the early grades. The Mill Spring faculty will miss the old school when it closes down at the end of May, says Howell. But teachers and principal are looking forward, he affirms, to the future of challenge and change that lies ahead.
