practice of gambling-a practice universally looked upon with horror in most civilized communities. Gamblers however. from the French women who gamble in stocks on 'Change down to the prudent Yankee who ventures to play 'pin on the hat,' to a certain extent, will flourish every where. Some gamble for fun, some for excitement, some for gain. There are more ways of gambling than one. They who seat themselves at the card table for a few hours of diversion-nay, those who make a business of swindling upon a small scale all their fellow men who do not happen to be ' up to snuff ?' are not the most dangerous gamblers in existence. But we have been well nigh betrayed into a homily, when we were only about to tell a brief story, for which we are indebted to a (not beard less) friend of ours. A certain town in a neighbouring State was troubled by the frequent visits of a very noted character, of the class to which mod ern refinement, in its zeal to avoid unnecessary offence, has given the name of 'sporting gentlemen.' His presence seriously annoved those who justly look upon the games of hazard as impious and profane appeals to the Author of all good. P. W. FANNING Admr.

The professional gentleman had several times been mulcted in this round sum in the course of two or three years, but all to no purpose, he still persisted in his evil ways, to the great and overwhelming sorrow of these who loved honesty and despised all the ways of vice.

> One morning, Judge Smith, the magistrate of the district was waited on by it zeal-pocket book, as large a pile, I know, as you can raise. Open your bank! The gamester commenced dealing the game of laro, and at it they went with unusual vigor and keenness. For a while the Judge laid his bets with much caution, and the game appeared to work nearly equal, neither party gaining any great advantage. By and by the magistrate commenced bet ting more extensively. The preacher, forgetting his office, his character, and the place, had left his chair, drawn towards the table, and was watching the progress of the game with intense and overwhelming anxlety. The crisis was really approaching fortune appeared to have declared in favor of the Judge-the pile of money before the gamester was rather diminishing, while his countenance underwent as many changes as the shifting clouds during a thunder storm.
