From the New Orleans Picayane. AN UNWELCOME SERENABER.

NO. 104.

The remarkably quiet and peaceable citizens residing in a certain portion of Barenne street, were awakend from their slumbers a few nights since, and from the enjoyment of divers and sundry dreams of Elysian fields, murderous attacks, storms at sen, tumbling down long flights of stairs, or of vain and repeated efforts to accomplish some desired obect (varying in character, of course, according to the amount of supper they had eaten and the state of their digestive organs)-by certain melodious sounds in the streets.-Some fancied they heard the wild and gushing melody of an Æolian harp-others, the discontented mutterings of some unhappy grunter, who, like a penny-a-liner after a hard day's work, had abandoned his pen in disgust. The sounds approached, and soon a not unmusical voice-somewhat thickened and husky from the effects of the dew-chaunted out :-"To ladies' eyes around boy, We can't refuse, we can't refuse, Though bright eyes so abound boy, "Tis hard to choose, tis hard to choose. For thick as stars that lighten You siry bowers, you airy bowers,

The countless eyes that brighten This earth of ours, this earth of ours. . But fill the cup where'er, boy, Our choice may fall, our choice may fall, We're sure to find love there, boy, So drink them all—so drink them all!

At this precise juncture, when the singer's voice reverberated in the drum of some neryous gentleman's ear, a window was heard to open suddenly, and a loud crash, as of bro- sleep a wink to-night, if he keeps a goint on ken crockery, followed.

'Hallon, old gentleman!' said the singer, you came very near my head then. I wish you would be a little more particular when -when you shower your favors upon public singers.
