THE SONG OF TOIL.

BY AUGUTINE DUGANNE.

Let han who will, rehearse the song Of gentle love and bright romance-Let han who will, with tripping tongue, Lead gleaming thoughts to fancy's dance But let me strike mine iron harp-As northern harrs were struck of old And let its music, stem and sharp, Arouse the free and bald!

My hands that iron harp shall sweep, Till from each stroke new strains recoil, And forth the sounding echoes leap, To join the arousing Song of Toil. Till men of thought their thoughts outs; eak, And thoughts awake in kindred mind;

And stirring words shall arm the weak,

And fetters cease to bind !

And crashing, soon, o'er soul and sense, That glorious harp, whose iron strings Are Labor's mighty instruments, Shall shake the thones of mortal kings And ring of axe, and anvil note, And rush of plough through yielding soil, And laboring engine's vocal throat, Shall swell the Song of Toil!

A Tradition of Portugal.

Listion when Denis of Portugal, the warrior bitter fancies," when a hand was laid on his and port king, celebrated his nuptials with the young and lovely Infanta of Castile,-The monarch's popularity was at its height; the multitude, who had already conferred on an apolegy for not having seen the sovereign him the title of "Father of his People," were roused to the most enthusiastic loyalty by the feasts and largesses bestowed on them; and the nobles, whose national pride was gratified by the alliance, found an additional source of satisfaction in their young sovereign's prudent dismissal of the queen's train of Castilian attendants, which prevented the possible influence of foreign favoritis-over one whose beauty and grace rendered it more than probable that she would become their " ruler's ruler." At the queen's request, however, a young page, whose insignificance | queen." appeared to make his presence or absence of
