THE STOLEN KISS.

BY E. C. EMBURY.

CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.

Part of his large estates lay on Long Island, and was divided into ferms, which were managed for hun by Dr. R-, the physician of the neighboring village, who the presence of the object he had so long had been his guardian and trustee of his fortune. On one part of his domain, in a couch, clad in a loose robe of white man most remantic and sequestered spot, Saville with her long bright curls falling upon her Grey, in a freak of architectural taste, had shoulders, and her hands, like carved ivery. built one of the loveliest and most pictures- so white and bloodless, folded helplessly toque of cottages. Situated on a green knoll, gether, lay the long-sought Lilian Glenwhich was admost cut into an island by the windings of it sparkling brook; overshadowed by superb old trees of primeval growth, covered with flowering vines which almost concealed the latticed windows, and moking, altogether, the prettiest of rural pictures, this cottage had shared the fate of most of Saville's hobbies -It had been his pet, his delight while buil. as if fever was burning in every vein. ding; nothing could exceed the interest he took in its construction and adornment, but to relate all the details of the next twelve no sooner was it completed than he left it months Saville Grey took lodgings with in charge of the good Doctor, begging himpresent frame of mind he thought of this quiet retreat as exactly the refuge required by his weary spirit, and he determined to take immediate possession of the cottage.

Ordering his tilbury, he drove out to see Dr. R and informed him of his inten-

"I am sorry to disappoint you, my dear sir," said the Doctor, "but the cottage is rented."

"To whom-pray? how long since were his impatient questions. "Don't you remember my writing to you, when you were in Europe for permission te to let it, as it was getting out of repair?

"I have recollection now about something of the kind, but I had no idea then of needing it. Who are the tenants?" "A widow and her invalid daughter." "Can't you persuade her to give it up?"

"Perhaps so-she is rather in straighened circumstances and"-"Oh! never mind expense; I am ready to pay for any whatle, only buy ber off.

and let me have the house." "Will you drive round with me and se her for yourself" "Perhaps that will settle the matter best so let us go at once " The gentlemen dreve off together, and on the road the Docter rather med to dissuade Saville Grey from his new design he suggested the loncliness of such a life, and ventured to hint at lodgings as preferable. But he had to deal with one whose wishes became necessities when thwarted, and he soon desisted from further counsel "What kind of a woman is this widow / will it do to make her a plump offer to buy out the lease?" "She is a most refined and elegant woman, subdued by her misfortunes, but a model of patient gentleness " "Then she is that most sensitive of human beings, a decayed gentlewoman "You shall judge; her husband, while travelling with his family in Europe, was beggared by the villainy of a partner. He hastened home, and when he discovered the extent of his losses he committed sar cole. The shock of his death threw the daughter into a finglisful state of nervous health. It was not until Saville had imexcitement; a long at of sickness followed. and though she is restored to comparative

"I thought I told you that your tenants lectures on military surgery, adduces the ten-were the widow and daughter of Charles timony of Sir James Macrigor to the state-Glenwood "

It often happens that people search far and wide for that which lies so near as to be quite overlooked. Saville Grey instantly conceived a new plan.

"Say nothing about the lease, my dear sir," said be, "but introduce me to the family as a young physician." Doctor R-looked grave.

"Do not misunderstand me, my friend," said Saville; "when I was in Paris, where I spent three long winters, I sought refuge in the schools in medicine from the fashionable follies of an exacting woman. I became extremely interested in the investigation of those mysterious nervous diseases which are always so baffling to the physician's kill, and under the guidance of some precautions were followed by the happiers

There are remedies—powerful and dang rous remedies it is true—which are always successful in these cases if properly a ed. Introduce me as a consulti cian, and with your assistance and Glenwood's permission I will venture to use these agents."

Dector R--still besitated, but the earnestness of Saville Grey's manner, il glow of enthusiasm which seemed to provade his whole frame, and the warm in est he showed in a case which had excite the Doctor's kindliest sympathies, co ed his scruples. He consented to all his young friends wishes, and Saville Gay soon found himself standing in the vis covered porch awaiting permission to be conducted to the fair patient.

Never had his heart thrilled with such wild emotion as when he found himself in sought in vain. Reclining on a wood.-Her cheek had lost something of its roundness and all its bloom, but her mouth-that tempting mouth-was still as fresh and rosy as ever. Mastering his emotion, he approached with as much professional gravity as he could assume, and taking one of those fair, lifeless hands, because to count its pulses, while his own throbast

He frankly stated their dans ard the risk attending their use, leaving to decide whether she would incur that make for the chances of entire recovery. In moment so trying to the feelings of all pardown; and Lilian uttered the language of her long silent heart, when she declared that early death was to her far preferable to the living death which she was new enduring. Touched to the very soul by her emotion, Saville Grey poured forth all the hoarded tenderness of his being in that one hour of wild excitement. When he left the cottage Lillan Glenwood was his betrothed wife-pledged to become his even if he should not succeed in restoring her to health -for on such terms only would be receive her plighted faith Who could have believed that the patient, watchful, studious, self-devoted physician, who, controlling every motion, now sat hour after hour tracing the gradual effect of certain medicines upon the delicate frame of that young girl, was she same Saville Grey who had lived only for hunself, and wearied of life's pleasures in the midst of satiety and luxury?

As soon as Lilian could walk without assistance, and place her own hand in the clasp of Saville Grey's, she consented to become his wife. They were married privately and quietly in the little parlor of the vine-covered cottage, and the next week they sailed for Italy, in whose genial climate Mrs. Grey entirely recovered her printed his first kiss on the lips of his intant daughter, that he ventured to remind health she is deprived of the use of her talian of her street adventure, and to avow hanself the offender in the well-remembered incident of her school days.
