A Fine Set of Teeth for 25 Cents.
White Teeth, Full Breath, Healthy Gums, Yellow and unhealthy teeth, after being once or twice cleaned with JONES' AMBER TOOTH PASTE, have the appearance of the most beautiful ivory, and at the same time it is so perfectly adapted to the structure of the teeth, that its constant daily use, highly advantageous, even to those teeth that are in good condition, giving them a beautiful polish, and preventing a premature decay. Those already decayed, it prevents from becoming worse—it also fastens such as are becoming loose, and by perseverance it will render the loosest teeth perfectly white, and make the breath deliciously sweet.

THE YOUNG WIFE.
BY ELIZABETH F. HALE.
Oh, God! how strong, and yet how weak is the human heart; and how, in how few understand it aright! Many an unconscious of these things, it may be, are fast hastening some loved one, to the silent grave. Aye, many a wife is journeying thither. Husband, dost thou know this?
Hast thou seen day after day, her cheek paling, her eye sinking, and her once buoyant step becoming slow, unsteady, and wavered? Dost thou know that for the sake of a suffering slave? O, no! thou canst not have known it, else wouldst heart have taken her to a home—an under-ridled home, and thrust her into hers.
But hark! now, O husband, wert it too late, what a treasure thou art losing!
Save her, O love her!

Aly Fallon was my friend. Thrown together among strangers, in a strange land, we were soon even as sisters. Indeed, by our schoolmates—for reader, we were school girls then—we were always called and treated thus. In the same class; with the same cares and pleasures from day to day, and with naturally a similarity of tastes, no wonder we became inseparable companions. Not that we were outwardly alike at all. O no! she was a gentleness, meekness and love; I more passionate, headstrong and wilful.
But underneath all this, was found a similarity. It mattered not what others said, we were satisfied.

For a year we remained thus, constantly together. Then I was called away. Parting I will never, never be forgotten.
For years we met not again. She returned to her own pleasant and far off home, and I entered upon the daily routine of a teacher's life. During the first twelve months my correspondence remained unbroken. In that time she was engaged, married, and removed still further from me.
Then her letters were full of joy and hope.
The future was all bright, and there seemed not a shadow on her young and sunny countenance. By and by her letters grew shorter, less frequent, and finally ceased altogether.

For three years I heard not from her.
At the end of that time a letter came.
With what eagerness I broke the seal! For I well know that delicate signature, and though the handwriting of her hand had changed, yet the spirit was the same. Her closing words, "Come, my dear Aly, I will have you with me before you know it." I hastened thither. She was indeed well, and in the spirit of her hand, she had written the words, "I will have you with me before you know it." Her husband was with her, and now for the first time I saw him. I wondered not that he had won that gentle being for his bride, for she so soon became his; for a more noble gentle hearted, devoted husband I never saw.

The day passed—fort had arrived in the morning—and Aly had just had sufficient strength to be assisted to a seat beneath a favorite tree in front of the house, and to her room again. Oh such a change!
Once so healthy, lively and buoyant, now she seemed more a shadow, lying upon fairy land than a living, moving person.
Yet the same clear brow was there, the same calm blue eye and sweet expression.
Her voice too, had only melted into more perfect harmony, and her heart, for more ready warmth.

"Come, my dear Aly, I will have you with me before you know it." I hastened thither. She was indeed well, and in the spirit of her hand, she had written the words, "I will have you with me before you know it." Her husband was with her, and now for the first time I saw him. I wondered not that he had won that gentle being for his bride, for she so soon became his; for a more noble gentle hearted, devoted husband I never saw.

The first few months after her marriage were those of unalloyed happiness. Her husband was largely engaged in the mercantile business in a western city, and he but prospered and happiness shone on their pathway. But the work on this business dream to had that he, who was to be the guide and companion through life, was all unworthy of the sacred charge.

Who could tell the sorrow of that young and devoted wife, when first the conviction burst upon her? It was not long that she had been too close an observer of human nature not to see and feel their danger.

Slowly and almost imperceptibly the fatal habit grew upon him. He was not the kind of man who would be contented with a moderate amount of wine, and gentle would also assist him, as he found that he was growing and his health was failing.

Not a word of notice had she ever before. He grew fonder his habit, and pleasantry and wit, and the wavered and he was not contented with a moderate amount of wine, and gentle would also assist him, as he found that he was growing and his health was failing.
