THE LAST BENEDICT.
We learn that measures are about to be adopted to revive the Bachelor's Club, as it existed some twenty-five years ago. Most, if not nearly all, of the officers and managers having been committed to matrimony long since, the Club has become, in a measure extinct. There never was a more agreeable association, nor were any balls got up with more magnificence than those of the old club. The first series of balls were held at the City Hotel, before that splendid saloon, with its numerous mirrors and silken draperies, was converted into sleeping rooms, and the Club driven, up to Niblo's, where there balls were more costly and crowded.

The Bachelor's Club, it must be borne in mind, was not established to perpetuate single blessedness; on the contrary, it was intended to bring together youth, beauty, taste, and character of both sexes—to place them in the most winning social intercourse, where pleasure, gaiety, and good manners prevailed; and in a few years not a manager, director, or even member of the club, was single, and many matches were made up from the agreeable association at these balls. One exception still existed, and we believe only one. We called a few weeks ago on one of the most active directors of the old club—a famous floor manager, as we called him—who took great delight in arranging the cotillions, finding partners for the company, saying soft and complimentary things to the ladies, and often mounting four pair of stairs to his lodging. We found him with a night cap on, looking as if it had been washed in Castilian streams, and with an old fashioned pair of spectacles on the tip of his nose.

—Why, Max, what devil are you at?
—I'm sewing a button on my pants!" said he, in a low, gruff tone.
—Why, have you no woman to do that little affair for you?
—Where should I get one? When I joined that swindling Bachelor's Club, we all swore never to marry. Hang me if there's a single one left but myself!" —You are the last, then, of the "cock'd hats?"

—Yes, I'm the last I suppose. On Sunday I met Frank Faithful—he who swore so often that no wife should ever give him a certain lecture—and what do you think he was about?
—Can't say.

—He was going to church, with his wife tucked under his arm, and three or four little ones walking before him, dressed in silk frocks. A pretty sight for a bachelor, to be sure!"
—Well, why don't you get a quiet, staid, clever woman for a wife—one who would mend your hose, and darn your night-caps, and rub your back, with opodeldoc when you had the rheumatism, or lumbago?
—Pooh, pooh!—nonsense! What's an old fellow like me to do with a wife?
My old black woman makes my bed and my tea. I dine down town—go to the Library to read the papers—play a rubber of whist at the Piggery—come home at ten, and tinkle in for the night."

—We cast a furtive glance around the room. Everything looked wretchedly delapidated. The dust and feathers had accumulated under the bed—rusty old coats and pants were hanging on pegs on the wall—two chairs had lost their backs—a tray, on which were the dregs of black tea and a piece of clammy toast, were lying on the table—a bottle on the wooden man-tepiece, had the remnant of a tallow candle in it—the embers of a fire threw on a tickler glare from the grate—a crack was chirping on the hearth, and a cockroach was throwing divers somersets in one corner of the room.

Every thing indicated carelessness, and an absence of all that was neat, clean, and comfortable, and yet Max was accounted rich, and in his time was quite a gallant—a perfect Beau Nash among the ladies; wore salmon-colored smalls, silk stockings and pumps, and was quite an Adonis at Hewlett's practicing balls, which were then held in the Long room, in William Street, opposite Cedar. His family had all died off, and he was left to the aid, with no one probably near him but his old negro wench—living in gloomy solitude, and dying "unwept, unhonored, and unsung," as the poet has it, and some graceless nephew administering the will, and squan-dering the old fellow's thousand in fast trotting horses on the avenue, or champagne suppers at Tortoni's.

—What makes you look so ruddy and healthy?" said he.
—A contented mind, Max, and domestic happiness.
—Ah very likely! Look at me, as the man says in the play, which half of me is fed?—I want all kinds of comfort!" —Then marry and marry wisely, for a young age a man may be caught in a trap!
So good day, Max, and better luck to you hereafter!"
We thought no more of Max, till on Sunday last we saw him ringing the bell of a neat two-story house in Franklin Street.
He had on a suit of black—a new wig, cane and gloves—and a middle-aged, matronly-looking gentle woman in black was hanging on his arm.

—Come in—come in! I've something to say to you!"
We entered the house.
—This is my wife!
—Your wife, Max?
—My wife, in sober earnest." We offered our congratulations.
—When you left me at your last visit I pondered on what you said and there was so much truth in it that I determined to marry!"

—But how did you manage to make such a good selection, Max?" said we, with a low bow to the lady, which she acknowledged with an expressive smile.
—Well, you shall know. My wife was an old sweetheart of mine, and had refused me in my younger days. She continued single and I always had a sneaking kindness for her. Three weeks ago I got into the same pew with her at church, and we read together from the same prayer book.
After service I walked home with her, and on the way I said—Well, Milly, why can't you and I always read out of the same prayer book and say Amen together?" —Well, said she, I don't know why we shouldn't. Suppose you come to-morrow night and drink tea with me, and we'll talk the matter over? Well, I did go, and got such a nice cup of tea before, when I said, Well, Milly, my old friend let's go to-morrow evening to Parson Smith's and get married. We are not strangers to each other. We are both comfortably well off and can be happy! She said—Here's my hand, Max, I will go! She did, and here we are!"
So then the last of the Bachelor's Club has gone!

Neil's Saturday Messenger.

From the New Orleans, Pietaque, March 6 Murder and attempted suicide.

Baronne street, between Julia and Girod streets, was yesterday afternoon the scene of one of the most horrible tragedies ever enacted in our city. The victim in the case was a beautiful girl about seventeen years of age, and is supposed to have been murdered by Joseph Bradley, captain of the schooner Friendship, who, after committing the deed, made an unsuccessful attempt upon his own life. Mrs. King, the landlady of the house in which the events occurred, says that Bradley and the girl had occupied apartments in her house about a month, passing as man and wife, that they were lying on the bed most of the time during the fore part of the day, and when she went out.

She returned home about 2 o'clock, and soon after entering she heard a moan proceeding from Bradley's room. She went to the door, thinking one of them was sick, and opened it, she saw Bradley lying on the floor in a pool of blood. She called a Mrs. Smith, who lives in the rear, and on coming back to the room, saw that the woman was also lying on the floor dead.
Some persons passing where immediately called in, and the police were sent for—Bradley was found to be living, and Dr.
Meux was called in and dressed his wounds. He was at this time perfectly insensible, but became conscious before half past 4 o'clock, at which time the coroner arrived.

The scene presented in the room was the most horrible we ever looked upon—The girl with stretched hands as if she had supplicated for mercy to the last, lay in one corner of the room, her hands, face and throat mangled in a most shocking manner, and in another corner Bradley presenting scarcely a less ghastly spectacle.

A post mortem examination was held upon the body of the girl, when it was found that she had received five wounds, all apparently inflicted with a knife, two of them mortal. The jury of inquest, after mature deliberation, brought in a verdict, that the girl died of the wounds above described, inflicted, as they believe, by the hands of Joseph Bradley. He was stabbed in the left side of the abdomen at different places, and his throat was pretty badly cut.

The cause which led to these terrible results is supposed to have been jealousy.— The name of the unfortunate girl is Fanny Daley, but she has also been known as Fanny Young, and more recently as Mrs.
Bradley. We believe she is a native of St. Louis, having been in New Orleans but about two years. We do know how long she has been acquainted with Bradley, but we are informed that she has lived with him as his wife only about a month.
Bradley is the commander of the schooner Friendship, advertised for California, to leave last evening.

We learned that he put the girl on board a boat, a few days since, to send her to her friends in St. Louis, and that after going up as far as Donaldsonville she returned, with a determination to go to California with Bradley. A jealousy on the part of Bradley appears to have existed for several days, and we believe that a difficulty, which resulted in blows, took place on Sunday last.

The Bulletin adds —
One thing connected with the murder is suspicious. Bradley had provisioned the Friendship for a three years' cruise and had borrowed several sums of money on the credit of the voyage. What these two facts may signify, is left open to discussion.
Bradley is a married man, and had a family in Connecticut. He is about 35 years of age. His victim was only 17, but for some time had been well known both in St. Louis and New Orleans, as a prostitute.
