TO DR. -----

How much your Lectures we admire;

When you explain the cause of thunder,

With so much plainness and simplicity,

Of seas and rivers, lakes and fountains,

And all the winds and storms that blow

How at your cloquence we wonder,

The origin of rocks and mountains,

Of rain and hall of frost and snow,

Besides an hundred wonders more,

But now dear Doctor, not to flatter,

There is a most important matter;

A matter which you never touch on,

A subject, if we wright conjecture,

The natural History of Love,

Tell us why poor tender hearts,

So willingly admit Love's darts;

Teach us the marks of love's beginning

What is it makes a beau so winning;

What is it makes a cox-comb witty,

A doctask wise, a sack cost pretty;

That we are engels in the skice,

Our eyes are stars - such charming noses.

Explain our laughing, and our weeping,

Explain our hoping, and our doubting,

Our blustering, simpering, and pouting,

Tell us all the enhanting, arts,

Of winning and keeping hearts;

Teach us Dear Doctor if you can.

To turn the wise ones into fools,

The proud and insolent to tools;

To humble that proud creature, man ;

To make them all run helter skelter,

Their necks into the marriage halter;

Then leave us to ourselves with these,

We'll rule and turn them as we please.

Dear Doctor if you'll grant our wishes,

We promise you five hundred kisses,

And rather than the affair he blundered.

We'll give you six score to the hundred,

This was what Toussaint called, in the negro dialect, "Firr la ronde a moin" The operations of Moyse were highly unsatisfactory to his uncle, from the fact of the humanity of the former sparing many who were hated by the latter, and who were consequently marked for destruction. Hence the resolution of Toussaint, following the bloody instinct implanted in the breast of man, whether in a civilized or a savage state, to destroy Move by force or fraud, as soon as fortune might chance to throw the means in his power. These unfortunately for Moyse, were soon forthcoming, and the power of Toursans was equal to the task of putting all his bloody

The Gonaives had been fixed upon as the next attacked after Toussain's favorne plan of operations, and near it chanced to be the place of residence of Monsieur De L ____e, Toussaint's late muster, (who was also his grandfather.) whom he had resolved to destroy, and consequently gave the necessary orders to Moyse, who pleaded in vain against the barbarous decree -Obey he must, and with heavy heart he went about the work of death. It was executed, and the body of Monsieur De Line -e was left naked on the road from the latter place. In a few hours Gonaives was attacked, and the tidings dally forwarded to Louverture, who was even then on his way from Gros Morne The usual demonstrations of grief and anger were gone through, but to what did not the hypocrifical passion of Louverture rise, when, bleeding and mangled on the road before him, h

Kneeling on the sand beside it, and kissing the cold hands over and over, while the tears rolled down his wrinkled and hideous cheeks, he called on heaven for vengeance on the murderers, cursing them in seeming bitterness of soul, while in reality, his heart was full of the most exceeding joy at the accomplishment of his desires, and his mind gloating already on the prospective fulfilment of his most bitter w shes towards Moyse. As if still further in mockery of every human feeling, he caused a grave to be dug, and the body to be buried with all "due observance," intimating his intention of marking the spot with a monument. He then continued his Among the many burbarous acts of Gen march for Gonaives, but when he arrive as Toussaint Louverture, during his reign the forewarned enemy had of course dis-
