EXPERIENCES OF A BARRISTER.
 THE MOTHER AND SON

Dinner had been over about half an hour on Sunday afternoon—the only day on which for years I had been able to enjoy a dinner—and I was leisurely sipping a glass of wine, when a carriage drove rapidly up to the door, a loud rat-rat followed, and my friend Dr. Curteis, to my great surprise, was announced.
 'I have called,' said the doctor as we shook hands, 'to ask you to accompany me to Mount Place. I have just received a hurried note from Mrs. Armitage, stating that her mother, after a very brief illness, is rapidly sinking, and requesting my attendance, as well as that of a legal gentleman, immediately.'
 'Mrs. Armitage?' I exclaimed, inexpressibly shocked. 'Why, it is scarcely more than a fortnight ago that I met her at the Rochfords, in brilliant health and spirits.'
 'Even so. But will you accompany me? I don't know where to find any one else for the moment, and time presses.'
 'It is an attorney, probably, rather than a barrister, that is needed; but under the circumstances, and knowing her as I do, I cannot hesitate.'
 We were soon bowling along at a rapid pace, and in little more than an hour reached the dying lady's residence, situated in the county of Essex, and distant about ten miles from London. We entered together, and Dr. Curteis, leaving me in the library, proceeded at once to the sick chamber.—About ten minutes afterwards the housekeeper, a tall, foreign-looking, and rather handsome woman, came into the room, and announced that the doctor wished to see me. She was deadly pale, and I observed, trembled like an aspen. I motioned her to precede me; and she, with unsteady steps, immediately led the way. So great was her agitation, that twice in ascending the stairs, she only saved herself from falling by grasping the banister-rail. The presage I drew from the exhibition of such overpowering emotion, by a person whom I knew to have been long not only in the service, but in the confidence of Mrs. Armitage, was soon confirmed by Dr. Curteis, whom we met coming out of the chamber of the expiring patient.
 'Step this way,' said he, addressing me, and leading to an adjoining apartment.—'We do not require your attendance, Mrs. Bourdon,' said he, as soon as we reached it, to the housekeeper, who had swiftly followed us, and now stood staring with eagerness on the doctor's face, as if life and death hung on his lips. 'Have the goodness to leave us,' he added tartly, perceiving she did not stir, but continued her fearful, scrutinizing glance. She started at his altered tone, flushed crimson, then paled to a chalky whiteness, and muttering, left the apartment.
 'The danger of her mistress has bewildered her,' I remarked.
 'Perhaps so,' remarked Dr. Curteis. 'Be that as it may, Mrs. Armitage is beyond all human help. In another hour she will be, as we say, no more.'
 'I feared so. What is the nature of her disorder?'
 'A rapid wasting away, as I am informed. The appearance presented are those of a person expiring of atrophy, or extreme emaciation.'
 'Indeed. And so sudden too?'
 'Yes I am glad you are come, although your professional services will not it seems, be required—a neighboring attorney having performed the necessary duty—something, I believe, relative to the will of the dying lady. We will speak together by and by. In the meantime, continued Dr. Curteis, with a perceptible tremor in his voice, 'it will do neither of us any harm to witness the closing scene of the life of Mary Rawdon, whom you and I twenty years ago worshipped as one of the gentlest and most beautiful of beings with which the Creator ever graced his universe. It will be a peaceful parting—Come.'
 Just as, with noiseless footsteps, we entered the silent death-chamber, the last rays of the setting sun were falling upon the figure of Ellen Armitage—who knelt in speechless agony by the bedside of her expiring parent—and faintly lighting up the pale, emaciated, sunken features of the so lately brilliant, courted Mrs. Armitage. But for the ineffable splendor of her deep blue eyes, I should scarcely have recognised her. Standing in the shadow, as thrown by the heavy bed-drapery, we gazed and listened unperceived.
 'Ellen,' murmured the dying lady, 'come nearer to me. It is growing dark, and I cannot see you plainly. Now, then, read to me, beginning at the verse you finished with as good Dr. Curteis entered. Ay, she faintly whispered, it is thus, Ellen, with thy hand clasped in mine, and with the words of the holy book sounding from thy dear lips, that I would pass away.'
 Ellen, interrupted only by her blinding tears, making sad stops, complied. Twilight stole on and threw its shadow over the solemn scene, deepening its holiness of
 I descended, full of emotion, to the library, where Dr. Curteis promised shortly to join me. Noiselessly, entering the room, I came suddenly upon the housekeeper and a tall young man, standing with their backs towards me in the recesses of one of the windows, and partly shrouded by the heavy cloth curtains. They were evidently in earnest conference, and several words, the significance of which did not at the moment strike me, reached my ears; before they did so, they turned hastily around, and eyed me with an expression of bustling alarm, which at the time surprised me not a little. 'All is over, Mrs. Bourdon,' said I, finding she did not speak; 'and your presence is probably needed by Miss Armitage.' A flash of intelligence, as I spoke, passed between the pair; but whether indicative of grief or joy, so momentarily was the glance, I should have been puzzled to determine. The housekeeper immediately left the room, keeping her eyes, as she passed, fixed upon me with the same nervous apprehensive look which had before irritated Dr. Curteis. The young man followed more slowly. He was a tall and rather handsome youth, apparently about one or two-and-twenty years of age. His hair was black as jet, and his dark eyes were of singular brilliancy; but the expression, I thought, was scarcely a refined or highly-intellectual one. His resemblance to Mrs. Bourdon, whose son indeed he was, was very striking. He bowed slightly, but courteously, to an equal, as he closed the door, and I was left to the undisturbed enjoyment of my own reflections, which, ill-defined and indistinct as they were, were anything but pleasant company. My reverie was at length interrupted by the entrance of the doctor, with the announcement that the carriage was in waiting to convey us to town.
 We had journeyed several miles on our return before a word was spoken by either of us. My companion was apparently even more painfully preoccupied than myself. He was, however, the first to break silence. 'The emaciated corpse we have just little resembles the gay beautiful girl for whose smiles you and I were once disposed to shoot each other.' The doctor's voice trembled with emotion, and his face, I perceived, was pale as marble.
 'Mary Rawdon,' I remarked, 'lives again in her daughter.'
 'Yes; her very image. Do you know, continued he, speaking with rapid energy, 'I suspect Mary Rawdon—Mrs. Armitage, I would say—has been foully, treacherously dealt with?'
 I started with amazement, and yet the announcement but embodied and gave form and color to my own ill-defined and shadowy suspicions.
 'Good heavens! How? By whom?'
 'Unless I am greatly mistaken, she has been poisoned by an adept in the use of such destructive agents.'
 'Mrs. Bourdon?'
 'No; by her son. At least my suspicions point that way. She is probably cognizant to the crime. But in order that you should understand the grounds upon which my conjectures are principally founded, I must enter into a short explanation. Mrs. Bourdon, a woman of Spanish extraction, and indeed who formerly occupied a much higher position than she does now, has lived with Mrs. Armitage from the period of her husband's death, now about sixteen years ago. Mrs. Bourdon has a son, a tall, good-looking fellow enough, whom you may have seen.'
 'He was with his mother in the library as I entered it after leaving you.'
 'Ah! Well, hem! This boy, in his mother's opinion—but that perhaps is some what excusable—exhibited early indications of having been born a "genius." Mrs. Armitage, who had been first struck by the beauty of the child, gradually acquired the same notion; and the result was, that he was little by little invested—with at least her tacit approval—with the privileges supposed to be the lawful inheritance of such gifted spirits; namely, the right to be as idle as he pleased—genius, you know, can, according to the popular notion, attain any conceivable amount of knowledge per saltum at a bound—and to exult himself in the stints of his own conceit above the useful and honorable pursuits suited to the station in life in which Providence has cast his lot. The fruit of such training soon showed itself. Young Bourdon grew up a conceited and essentially-ignorant puppy, capable of nothing but bad verses, and thoroughly impressed with but one important fact, which was, that he, Alfred Bourdon, was the most gifted and the most ill-used of all God's creatures. To genius, in any intelligible sense of the term, he has in truth no pretension. He is endowed, however, with a kind of reflective talent, which is often mistaken by fools for creative power. The morbid fancies and melancholy scorn of a Byron, for instance, such gentry reflect back from their foggy imaginations in exaggerated and distorted forms.
