A SAD STORY. THE OUTCAST.

BY THE LATE WILLIS GAYLORD CLARK.

Whole No. 570

A few days ago as I was taking my accustomed mornings's walk, in a mild October morn, in the surburbs whereof I am a denfizen, 1 found myself, on a sudden, in the open country. The melancholy landscape of Autumn stretched around; and the bright hues which had characterized the season were beginning to disappear .----Nothing disturbed my meditation, except the passage of some early market men or women, hieing with their little world of cares and hens to the market of the town. wandered unconsciously onward, until discovered that I was, as it were, in the midst of a crowd, fronting a lew time-worn tenement. A few vehicles were drawn up around it, and seeing a medical friend whom knew, I inquired the cause of the assent bly. He informed me that a young girl had committed suicide, and was then lying dead in an upper apartment. Moved with

In one apartment were several females in tears and distress; in another, the witnesses and members of the coroner's jury. Ascending the staircase, 1 found myself in the presence of the dead ! of one, who before the dark day of nothingness had swept the lines of beauty from her features, was lying on a pallet of straw pale in dissolution. The sight was mournful and solemn. Her face had lingering about it all the features of beauty, its ensign was still floating above the voiceless lip, and the deep sealed eye. Heavy mas-ses of rich auburn hair lay on each of her snowy temples; a faint hue lingered about the checks; but the foamy and purple lips indicated how violent a death she had died. By the bed-side lay a half eaten apple, and a large rhomboid of corrosive sublimate .--Particles of this deadly poison were still on the fruit. Thus the life-weary taker had ended her days. I looked out upon the gloomy waste of country over which she had gazed her last, at twilight, the evening before, and tried to realize what must have been the depth of agony which possessed her spirit then. How must her bruised heart have throbbed with misery !

There are moments when the mysteries of eternity throng so rapidly upon our imagination that we live years of contemplation in their little round. This was the case with me. There lay the prostrate form of one whose only crime had been, that she had "loved, not wisely but too well," one who, stung to the heart by the destroyer of her peace, had now determined to lay down her aching head and sorrowful bosom in the rest of the grave.

As I stood gazing at the lifeless object before me-interrupted only by the pitying or the sobs of those who were below-1 was requested by the surgeon in attendance as a personal favor, to go in his private car-riage to the residence of the father of the deceased, and apprise him of the fatal oc-currence, of which he was still ignorant. Everything around betokened ease and plenty if not opulence. The folding doors of the parlor soon opened, and the warm air from an ad-joining elegant apartment came in from an other fire. The father stood before me. He was a respectable looking person, but wore about him the marks of violent passions, and an indomitable will. It was by slow and painful degress that
