Students Show Projects

typing paper and wrote the Preamble on it with a ball point pen. To create the old, parchment look, he singed the edges by burning. Next he soaked his "document" in a pan of coffee, then placed it in the oven to dry and then glued it on a piece of plywood! No doubt about it -- it looked authentic!

According to teachers Murphy and Repetto, this is always a part of each unit where students have the chance to select a project of their own choosing to make and explain. The students and teachers hail from Cook Intermediate School where Logan Burke is principal.

Carter's Mandate

President must be aware that the political honeymoon comes to a fairly early end anyway, and that it's necessary to act swiftly and boldly at the start of a new Administration.

Black people, poor people, and the jobless are looking to Washington today for signs that their interests will -- for a change -- be advanced, that their cities will be helped, their children well-schooled, their families well-housed. They are looking for decent jobs, health care and peace.

The government can't do it all, but it is the single most important instrument of securing these basics for the bulk of our citizens. The policies it pursues affect the private sector's role. Its enormous power should no longer be placed at the service of inequality and the status quo. Rather, it should be the righter of wrongs and the instrument of constructive change.

The biggest priority facing the nation is full employment, and President Carter should modify his economic proposal to ensure full employment. By doing so, he will set his Presidency on the bold course of greatness.
