WORLD SCENE:

FOCUS ON WORLD WATER CONSERVATION

The United Nations Water Conference dealt with the world's stock of fresh water and how to avoid a crisis of global dimensions which could easily occur by the end of the century unless world water management is drastically improved.

The world water conference came at the right time. Recent droughts and floods in many parts of the world—the Sahel, the Western United States, Europe, South Asia—have called dramatic attention to the vital role played by water in all human life.

Water is basic to just about every human process and activity. Some of the world's most urgent needs: for greater food production, the creation of new industries, the transformation of urban and rural slums into more healthful environments depend on adequate supplies of usable water. Just making provision of water is not enough. Quality; i.e. freedom from pollution, is becoming more important all the time. Lack of minimally acceptable water looms as one of the great bottlenecks to economic and social development over the next 25 years. Rich and poor countries alike are affected. It is this universality of the problem and its potentially crippling impact on the provisioning of the growing world population that makes it a matter of global concern.

The United Nations Water

Conference was not an isolated event. It took its place alongside the other great international conferences which are shaping the international community's approach to urgent world problems on the Environment (Stockholm, 1972) on Population (Bucharest, 1974), on Food (Rome, 1974) and on Human Settlements (Vancouver, 1976) which both foreshadowed the importance of Water Conference and in effect directed a part of its endeavour by asking it to set forces in motion which will assure that by 1990 every living person will be assured of an adequate supply of clear drinking water. The magnitude of the task becomes apparent by a few simple figures. About one-fifth of all urban dwellers and three-fourths of the world's rural population who now lack such supplies will need international agreements in principle are to be carried out. The purpose of the Conference was to create a state of preparedness which will, it is hoped, prevent world water stringencies from assuming dimensions which would create supplies of usable water sufficient to carry out the development on which the provisioning of a growing world population depends. Since the world water stock is fixed, no augmentation of the total can be expected. What is needed is better exploitation and more rational base. Present water use practices are often based on the assumption—falsely—that water, where it exists, is a free resource, there for the asking.
