Inside

● An anthropologist tells why underprivileged children often do not do well in school--because they're not expected to. See page two, which also features the latest annual testing results

● A former valedictorian at Atkins High School is now the principal at Lowrance Intermediate School and leader of a national organization. However, she wonders if she could repeat that success in the school atmosphere of today.

● The impact of desegregation on top level jobs for black educators in the local schools is explored on page 16; the legacy of Mary McCloud Bethune is described on page 18;

● 54 prizes are waiting for children who complete and send in the Chronicle Coloring Contest on page 10, which also features a look at the mathematics curriculum in the Winston-Salem/Forsyth County Schools.
