Political Junk Food

peatedly confusing the issues, "right-to-work" forces have scored some key victories during the last two years. In Arkansas, for instance, they successfully blocked a spirited attempt to repeal that state's compulsory open shop law. And in Louisiana they passed legislation outlawing all clauses. Now, the business-supported National "Right-to-Work" Committee has opened shop in Missouri with the hope of selling its sugar-coated, but hazardous proposals. Fortunately, many key black leaders in Missouri and across the country fully understand that a victory for "right-to-work" could very well spell disaster for the black community, economically as well as politically.

For black people, the economic consequences are especially clear. As numerous studies have shown, black union members earn substantially more than non-union blacks. In 1974, for example, the median weekly income of black union members was $169, while non-union blacks received only $124 -- a difference of more than a third. By weakening unions through compulsory open shop laws, the economic security of thousands upon thousands of black union members will be jeopardized.

To sweeten the bitter economic impact of "right-to-work" laws, their leading proponents assert that "union free" states and localities quickly attract business investment which creates more jobs. The facts, however, tell a different story. A few years ago, the former Governor of Kansas -- one of 20 "right-to-work" states -- claimed that such laws actually discourage industrial development.

Healthy House Plants

Essentially, there are two kinds of house plants, either of which can make your home look and feel livelier and lovelier: plain green-leaved and variegated, or flowering plants. The former are often easier to grow; the latter, often more of a pleasure to show.

MOST HOUSE PLANTS should be repotted within three years.

House plants of either kind often need repotting. You can tell they've become pot-bound when they produce little or no new growth and dry out quickly, even after frequent watering. The roots of such plants may protrude from drainage holes.

Generally, young plants should be repotted once a year, usually in spring. Established plants need repotting about every two to three years. A pot-bound plant should be transplanted only when its soil is slightly moist.

The Reader's Digest Illustrated Guide to Gardening, a 672-page, easy-to-read book on most aspects of gardening, suggests you invert the pot-bound plant and shake out the ball of roots and soil, ease away some of the old soil and set the root ball on fresh potting soil in the new pot. Trickle more soil around it. Hold the plant loosely by the stem and firm the soil with your fingers. Proper repotting can help keep your houseplants from going to pot.

development. Furthermore, Professor Daniel H. Pollitt of the University of North Carolina concluded that a variety of studies "indicate that right-to-work states have not received more than their proportionate share of a new industry, and that the enactment of right-to-work laws is in no way responsible for the increase in non-farm employment."

While business groups supporting "right-to-work" efforts claim to be solely concerned with "protecting the freedom of their em-other conservative measures, such as cuts in school budgets, reductions in desperately needed social services, and "tax reforms" that aid the rich. In short, another "right-to-work" victory, especially this year, will further encourage the peddlers of political junk food.
