

Buying Mowers

Summer is time to care for and enjoy yards and gardens. It may be a grim thought for some that lawn and garden care means using power mowers and hedge trimmers. However whether gasoline or electric powered, these units can save hours of work and give professional-looking results. But watch out! Almost all outdoor power touches; grass, hedges, hands, and feet.

Product Safety Commission reports some 7,000 injuries each year to users of power mowers alone. Statistics also show that the majority of power equipment injuries are caused by improper use, not by equipment failure. The Better Business Bureau has some tips on how to buy and use power equipment safely.

Safety features are an important consideration when shopping for power mowers and hedge trimmers. While outdoor power equipment industry adheres to a voluntary set of safety standards, the various safety features can effect the cost of a given unit. Paying a little more for a safer to use unit could be a good investment in terms of performance and safety.

A mower should have a rear guard to prevent blade contact with hands and feet. The blades should be recessed inside the machine to reduce the chance of rocks or other sharp objects being thrown into the air. The discharge chute should aim down and away from the operator. All controls should be designed so the unit can be shut-off or stopped easily and immediately in case of emergency.

Tractor or rider-type mowers can be hazardous in terms of tipping over or injuring others if improperly used. Be certain the unit under consideration is designed for the kind of work it will be used for, whether level, slope, or hillside mowing. Safety features should include secure, balanced seating and quick stopping.

Properly designed hedge trimmers will have cutting teeth closely set and guards placed so that hands or fingers cannot come into blade contact. Trimmers should have two handles, with the wide forward handle set well above the blades. The unit should be light enough to hold and use for extended periods of time and the power switch should be designed for easy and immediate shut-off.

Be sure to read and thoroughly understand all operating and safety instructions for a power unit. Terms of warranties and guarantees are equally important. Learn the terms of both the manufacturer's and seller's warranties for parts and servicing. Be sure the unit is maintained according to these terms to keep warranties in effect. Before using the unit, practice emergency shut-off or stopping procedures to avoid or minimize accidents.

When it is time to mow lawns or fields take a few minutes to clear the ground of stones and other debris.
