In 1979, U.S. District Court Chief Judge William Bryant ruled that the Washington, D.C. portion of the mammoth raid was illegal. Judge Bryant stated in his decision that, "The type of seizure here involved should be forcefully discouraged rather than condoned." He also rebuked government agents who, "engage in vigorous overt action which is especially designed to subvert the protections which the (Fourth) Amendment seeks to afford."

District Court Judge Charles Richey ruled separately on the much more intrusive Los Angeles portion of the FBI raid, saying the agents acted in a reasonable manner. It is this decision that is currently being appealed.

The National Bar Association brief states, "The present case is of particular interest to the National Bar Association because the issues presented concern the continued integrity of a fundamental constitutional provision, the Fourth Amendment right of the people to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures."

According to Church spokesman Gregory Layton, "These groups and individuals share a common concern in preserving the integrity of the Fourth Amendment. Clearly the outcome of this case will determine the scope of Americans' privacy protections for the future."

build something of this nature. "It would be more efficient to hire one firm to do both jobs and get the job done faster."

The problem arose when representatives from the North Carolina Chapter of the National Electrical Contractors Association submitted suggestions to the house designed to protect the subcontractors.

After the Association submitted their suggestions, Mayor Wayne Corpening, City Manager Stewart and City Attorney, Rod Legan, began a series of meetings with the Executive Director of (NECA), John Boyd, to develop an amendment which would be satisfactory to all concerned parties. To date no agreement has been reached. Mayor Corpening declined comment on the situation except to say that his staff was currently working on an amendment.

Boyd said, "The original Bill would exempt the city from a fair system that has proven in the past to prevent corruption in the business." "We could see where the city would save money by constructing the Raddison in this way, but we don't feel that it should apply to anything else."

Perhaps the outstanding pre-Civil War black journalist was Samuel Cornish, who, with John Russwurm, established Freedom's Journal, the first black newspaper, in 1827.

of this state," she said.

The Thomasville teacher said there is a need for some process that will allow teachers to have more input into the decision-making process, but she said any concept that relies on artificially creating discord is "bankrupt and certain of failure."

She said the NCAE is "quite aware of the state law which prohibits public employers from signing collective bargaining agreements with employees" and will not attempt to force school boards to break this law.

"We have tested that statute twice in the courts, and it has been sustained. If collective bargaining is to come for public employees, it will have to come from the General Assembly," she said.

Mrs. Martin said NCAE has displaced collective bargaining from its current legislative program and has placed the matter under the control of a special committee of the Board of Directors of NCAE. That committee's task, she said, is to ascertain how much support there is for collective bargaining and to determine if some system of guaranteeing teacher input into decisions can be developed.

"The teachers of North Carolina are professional persons. They care about the children they teach. I hope our citizens won't let this situation convince them otherwise," she said.

Mrs. Martin predicts the issue of collective bargaining will be a matter of much discussion during NCAE's upcoming convention in Asheville. The convention is slated for April 3-4.

tempt on what he called "the current atmosphere."

"It's very tragic, simply because people might disagree with one another about politics, but this is the kind of atmosphere that the Moral Majority and the Ku Klux Klan and other extremists groups lend themselves to. We have to start now to protect the rights of other people," Hairston said.

Dr. Barbara Phillips, national basileus of Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Inc., and principal of Lowrance School, said that she hoped some good would come of the tragedy.

"Out of tragedy will come love, sound reasoning and logic and we have to decide where we're going from here," she said.

Dr. Phillips said that although she was glad that President Reagan's life had been spared, she was concerned about the other three men who were also shot.

"I am concerned that so little was focused on the others who were injured. I know that because of politics, the head of this country is most important, but I hope we can see that all men are equal," she said.

Dr. Phillips added, "I hope some good can come out of this tragedy. Our values have to be sorted out in this society and this nation has to return to a firm belief and worship in God."

She blamed members of the media for what she called "creating confusion surrounding the assassination attempt," citing many reports throughout Monday, that were inaccurate.

"The privileged few who govern must govern more than the privileged few," she said.

Herman Aldridge, head of the city's Human Relations office, called the events of Monday, "unfortunate."

"I hope he doesn't suffer and I hope he doesn't die said Aldridge of the president. Aldridge was quick to add that while he doesn't agree with the president's policies, he would rather see Reagan carry them out than someone else.

Winston-Salem Urban League Executive Director Thomas Elijah said that the first thing he thought of when hearing about the president was the attempt made on national urban league executive director Vernon Jordan's life.
