Unfortunately, this is a true story. Not long ago, we received a letter from a woman in response to one of our earlier BOCA messages. It seems she wanted to get a present for her friend's three year old daughter. So she bought her a doll. A beautiful, Black baby doll. A perfect gift for a beautiful, Black three year old "mommy". Only this mommy wouldn't play with it. In fact she wouldn't even look at it. She just threw it aside and started crying, convinced it was no good.

Something was wrong with it. It was Black. Well, something was wrong, and it wasn't the doll. Or the baby. It was the way some children are taught to see themselves. And that's a problem too many Black kids have—because they don't see Blacks portrayed honestly, often enough as we really are, showing our hopes, our problems and our needs. You can help change that. How? By helping to keep Black media strong. By deciding which companies and other media portray Blacks fairly and letting them know they've got your support. And by letting them also know when they're not doing a good job. They'll get the message. And you'll be helping to make sure our kids develop real self pride. Which is important. Because when a three year old Black child says "Mama, something's wrong with this Black doll" she's really saying "Mama, something's wrong with me." And that's a tragedy.
