agent and instructor in the business department at Winston-Salem State University--but that "none of these jobs were sufficient to maintain my family's basic needs."

El-Amin also says in the letter that he had made arrangements to pay off his debts as he was able.

"Upon successfully obtaining a full-time job," the letter says, "I paid some of my obligations and outlined a plan of payment for my other obligations."

El-Amin said that the article, moreover, raised an issue which is irrelevant to this campaign.

"It is not an issue that relates to who in our city is best qualified to respond to the interests of our children," El-Amin said.

El-Amin, who ran unsuccessfully for a school board seat in 1980, says he is even more determined to seek election this year. Listed among his platform objectives are 1) the establishment in the schools of "the proper environment for learning that challenges the young minds in our school system," 2) a "cooperative partnership among teachers, principals and parents" and 3) the development of "an alternative structure which promotes the interdependence of students, teachers and parents, instead of shifting the blame for the performance of our children to the home environment or school environment or administrative environment."

In a prepared statement, Bob Jones III, the university's president, echoed Harris' contention that no discrimination exists at the school.

"Bob Jones University is not a racist institution," the statement says. "There's no racial discrimination here."

Jones goes on to say in the statement that he welcomes the president's Jan. 12 call for legislation against tax-exempt status for discriminatory private schools.

"In the passage of that bill," he said, "certainly the Congress should be expected to clearly delineate the definitions of racial discrimination and in that process avoid encroachment on religious freedom guaranteed by the Constitution." Officials of the Goldsboro Christian Schools, who also were fighting their lack of tax-exempt status in the Supreme Court, declined comment.

Goldsboro Christian Schools do not admit black students.

Government officials say Bob Jones University, founded in 1927, began to admit black students in 1976.

Despite the president's call for legislation to deny their tax-exempt status, both Bob Jones U. and Goldsboro Christian Schools will be able to claim tax exemptions until Congress acts.

Since 1969, the IRS has denied 111 private schools tax-exempt status. Lack of tax-exempt status means that contributions to the schools are not tax-deductible and that the schools do not enjoy the privilege of not paying social security taxes, unemployment taxes, or

on this point.

Concerning his call for legislation against discriminatory schools, President Reagan said in a Tuesday press conference, "I am opposed in every fiber of my being to discrimination."

In his own prepared statement, issued Jan. 12, Reagan said, "I would not knowingly contribute to any organization that supports racial discrimination. My record and the record of this administration are clear on this point.

"I am also opposed to administrative agencies exercising powers that the Constitution assigns to the Congress. Such agencies, no matter how well-intentioned, cannot be allowed to govern by administrative fiat.

"...I believe that the right thing to do on this issue is to enact legislation which will prohibit tax exemptions for organizations that discriminate on the basis of race."

entire country support segregation."

But North Ward Alderman Larry Little was not shocked or outraged.

"We have seen time and time again that this administration is not committed to the needs of the poor or concerned with civil rights," Little said. "We should expect these things, and yes address them, but the question is what are we going to do for ourselves?"

Little also said that he believed that Reagan's administration has come the closer to forming a cabinet system than any other administration prior to his taking office.

"Reagan himself hasn't made ten major decisions on his own and I don't believe that he made this one," said Little. "I think that decision was made by his staff, but regardless of that, the key thing to our salvation is us."

Reggie Warren, para-legal counselor for Legal Aid Society, said the policy is "a great injustice."

"It's an unjust policy," said Warren. "It's a roll-back on what has already been done. We can't give people the things necessary for survival, but we can underwrite institutions that do not make themselves available to all. It's just wrong."

Beverly Mitchell, an attorney who has spent a large portion of her career researching the legalities of civil rights had these observations:

"Tax-exempt status to those institutions that overtly practice segregation requires all people, even those who can't take advantage of the institutions' services, to support them. That is grossly unfair. Not only is it unfair, but it gives encouragement to other institutions who have put up a facade of acceptance mandated by equal opportunity and affirmative action."

Herman Aldridge, director of the Human Relations Commission, sees the administration's actions as condoning segregation.

"According to what I understand to be true, it is right and proper under the law not to grant those schools tax-exempt status," Aldridge said. "What they're really saying is it's all right to discriminate."

specific action at this point," Little said, "we plan to further gather information and refine the list."

When asked if the group has a designated leadership, Little said the group has a "no-name leadership at this point."

Leaders, he said, will materialize with time.

"I see the group as a channel for new leadership," Little said, "new leadership that hasn't gotten burned out."

Little said that this new, young leadership will consist of specialists.

"People have to realize that we're not a monolith," Little said.

"They may not be Martin Luther King or Malcolm X," Little said of the new leaders, "but we do have leadership and we need to recognize that."

Clifton Graves, an affirmative action officer at Winston-Salem State University, and Pat Hairston, president of the Winston-Salem NAACP, joined Little as principal speakers at the meeting.

Graves said he agrees with Little that the group has gotten off to a good start.

"This session was a concrete example of what Dr. King meant about fulfilling the dream," Graves said. "In order for that dream to become reality, we need to come together as a community to plan political and economic strategies."

Political strategies planned by the group include the targeting of office-holders who have not been responsive to the black community and the support of candidates who will be responsive to the black community.

Joining the speakers at Shiloh was the Healing Force, a husband and wife singing duo comprised of Joseph and Gail Anderson.

The group will assess its progress on April 4, the anniversary of the death of Dr. King.

"We will then reveal the names of the businesses and politicians derelict in their responsibilities and obligations," Little said.

Chancellor for Student Affairs Haywood Wilson, neither of whom could be reached for comment by press time.

According to residents of Atkins, the heat was rising by mid afternoon and by Wednesday evening the building was warm. Said one resident, "It is amazing how fast they got things moving after the meeting. I guess we do have some clout around here."
