Because he felt that important a decision should be made by the family involved, he says he tried to give the family advice in making the decision, but not to influence them.

"I think it's bad for a minister to say whether you ought to take a person off a life-support machine," says Anderson.

For the person who is dying, Anderson says the minister should help them accept it, but he says it can be "difficult" for the person who is "not a person of faith."

How does the periodic loss of church members affect the minister?

Drayton says it becomes more difficult the longer you are with a congregation because you become more attached to the members, but "it's a part of the duty the minister has to deal with."

"It's getting increasingly strenuous because of the length of time that I've been here," Drayton says.

"I find it comforting," Butler says, "because I delight in helping people and being a help."

Anderson says the minister has to be strong. "I have seen death all through my life," he says. "I do anything about the sadness, but ministers don't feel it as keenly as the immediate family does. We feel it. Being human, we have to."
