Hay fever

Many people think hay fever is solely a spring ailment, but The North Carolina Medical Society says that, unfortunately, hay fever can also occur in the summer, fall...and even in the winter.

The most common causes of hay fever and asthma are pollen, molds, and insect particles. These factors are most apparent during the spring, summer and fall, but molds can also cause winter allergy among industrial grain workers, people who go on hay rides, and others who are in contact with stored grain.

The most effective treatment for hay fever and asthma is shots. This means regular injections of solutions of pollen or other allergy-producing substances, beginning with tiny doses, not enough to produce allergic symptoms. As the doses are increased, the body will produce enough antibodies to counteract the harmful substance when it is encountered naturally.

A number of over-the-counter medications are available for milder cases of hay fever, but your physician can give the best advice.

Much research needs to be done on hay fever, but the fact is that many sufferers still fail to take advantage of available remedies.
