

Ajuga, a hardy, versatile groundcover, is a smart choice for landscaping.

If you are looking for a hardy, versatile groundcover for your landscape, ajuga should receive serious consideration.

Ajuga -- commonly called Bugleflower -- is one of the most popular groundcovers. Agricultural Extension Service specialists at North Carolina State University explain that it can be used in rock gardens and for such purposes as under-plantings for trees and shrubs.

It will grow in shade and on slopes as well as on flat areas.

Ajuga grows about five inches high and has a dense, compact form. The dark green foliage is three to four inches long and one inch wide. Some varieties turn bronze in the fall.

Few groundcovers grow as easily and as quickly as ajuga. It spreads by runners, much like strawberry plants.

For a quick cover, the NCSU extension specialists suggest planting ajuga eight to ten inches apart. It should be easily established since the smallest piece with roots usually takes hold.

Ajuga can be planted at any time during the growing season. However, it has a shallow root system and may need watering during dry periods.

In starting a new planting, till up the entire area, mulch and then set the plants through the mulch. If the soil is hard and crusty, work in lots of organic matter when tilling.

Wait about a month, or until the plants have become established, before applying fertilizer. This will reduce the risk of injury to young, tender roots.
