Foreign language assignments have kept many a high school student at home on Friday nights, and as curricula have become more technically oriented, enthusiasm for language classes has dwindled.

Mrs. Grissom says that in the past foreign languages were a standard requirement for college entrance, but since the requirements have been somewhat relaxed, many students do not voluntarily sign up to take the classes.

"Language enrollment has gone down since the students have some leeway depending on what their college majors will be," says Mrs. Grissom. "We had to promote the foreign language in order to keep it alive. I was able to keep it alive even when it was dying, but I had to give them some reason for taking a language. I started our French singing group and planned trips to foreign countries like Europe and Mexico."

Mrs. Grissom has seen a variety of students come and go during her years of teaching. Have students changed much over the years?

Laughing Mrs. Grissom says, "There have been many changes in educational techniques in my time, but the students have remained basically the same." ...
