Jackson State's Pete: His patience paid off

Jackson State quarterback Melvin Pete Jr. is one of those non-descript athletes who somehow manages to get the job done.

Pete, a 6-foot, 165-pound redshirt junior who is starting for the first time this season, lacks outstanding size. He doesn't possess a rocket-launcher for an arm. He won't dazzle you with his quickness. But through his patience and heady play, he became Jackson State's No. 1 signal caller during preseason practice.

Entering preseason practice, Pete's career stats read three attempts, zero completions and one interception and he was listed as the backup to sophomore Shannon Boyd. But Pete had his own ideas about who should be No. 1.

When Pete arrived at Jackson State, John McKenzie and Derek McCall were battling to be the starting quarterback. He waited and watched while McKenzie won the job and went on to set a Jackson State single-season record for total offense, pass attempts, completions and passing yardage.

"It was hard and discouraging," said Pete.

But Pete made the most of the situation. Ever a student of the game, he learned some of the more subtle aspects of being a college quarterback while watching McKenzie, and even though he came out of spring practice No. 2 on the depth chart, he knew he was ready to take charge.

"I really didn't accept being a backup," he said. "In spring practice, we had the same hold system."

"I felt, if we got new coaches (Offensive Coordinator Ralph Bishop and Quarterback Coach Ray Greene) and a new system and I jumped on that system and learned it as well as anyone else, I could become No. 1. I never lost confidence in my ability to play, even though I hadn't played."

Pete's confidence was well founded. Against Tennessee State, in just his second collegiate start, he completed 24 of 43 attempts for 393 yards and four touchdowns.

"He threw quite a bit in high school," said Greene, who is noted for his knowledge of the passing game. "You recruit talent. You can teach anything you want, but if you can't throw the ball"

Pete was a thrower and nothing else when he played Provine High. Problem was, the Rams were a running team. The only time Pete played was in obvious passing situations. Kenneth Breland, who now plays defensive back for Jackson State, was the starter.

"Our philosophy was to run the ball," said Provine Coach Stanley Blackmon. "We didn't exploit his talents."

Because his talents weren't exploited at Provine, or in his first three years at Jackson State, Pete is still learning the ropes. It has shown on more than one occasion, as his interception rate reflects. He threw nine in a three-week span.

Pete is still learning his receivers, too. In some instances, that has cost him. In one game tight end Victor Hall noticed a certain coverage and signaled it to Pete. However, Pete misread the coverage and threw an interception, thinking Hall was going to run his regular route.

"It's like anything else you haven't done for a while," said Pete. "You get rusty."

Even at that, Greene, who came to Jackson State from Alabama State, where he was offensive coordinator over the summer, likes the quarterback's development.

"He has a good feel for the game," said Greene. "The main thing was teaching him the system. He's still learning. Each game is a new situation for him. Like most young quarterbacks, he wants to hold the ball too long.

"You have to zero in on the guy you want to go to and then be able to come back to someone else if he's not open. That's the thing that makes (Mississippi Valley quarterback Willie) Totten so tough.

"He's able to buy time and pick up other people. Everything he's doing now is the result of four weeks of practice and getting ready for a game each week."

Pete showed he is learning in one game when he spotted Stacy Mobley, a secondary receiver running free over the middle, and hit him with a 43-yard touchdown pass.

"He's not a great athlete," said Greene. "He doesn't have a great arm. But he's a competitor. The thing I like about him is he doesn't let things bother him too much. If he throws an interception, he comes right back throwing. Even in adversity, he comes back.

"I'm impressed with him. He doesn't panic and throw the ball up for grabs. He's on schedule, considering the length of time he's played. He's a little bit better than I thought he would be."

When Pete signed with Jackson State in 1982, few eyebrows were raised. It was written off as another case of a coach's son getting a free ride. Melvin Pete Sr. is the Tigers' defensive line coach.

But the fact that Grambling and Tennessee State, a pair of schools that know a good quarterback when they see one, recruited him should have said something about Pete's ability.

He was set to cast his lot with Grambling when Jackson State recruiter Bob Hughes showed up on signing day. Because Pete wanted to be close to his mother, he went with Jackson State.

It's a decision he has not regretted, but he has been through some tense moments because he is a coach's son.

"I was a freshman," he said. "I'd walk into a room and everyone would get real quiet. That happened a couple of times. But I didn't let that bother me. I knew if I got the chance to play and show what I could do, my teammates would follow me."
