background before we start recognizing him as a hero," said Grand Dragon Dave Holland of Lithonia, Ga.

Holland called his group "the most militant white racist Klan organization in the South." He said the Southern White Knights are "opposed to violence," but "we believe in self-defense."

As evidence of King's "communist" links, Holland cited King's participation in sessions at Tennessee's Highlander Center, which has for two decades instructed activists in the labor and civil rights movements.

"It is a shame and a disgrace that the American people are honoring a known communist," Holland said.

Harris told the Klan group that his policy is to reserve state property for activities marking the state holiday being celebrated. King's birthday is one of 12 state holidays.

Since activities already have been planned in commemoration of the King holiday, the Klan's request "is not appropriate and cannot be honored," the governor said.

"I hope that you will recon- demonstrate, even in the vicinity of the state Capitol, in order to avoid potentially disruptive activities. In any event, I want you on notice now that no disruption of planned events will be tolerated," Harris added.

The Southern White Knights is composed of about 60 former members of the Stone Mountain-based National Knights of the KKK. Holland said his group split from the National Knights because of its leaders' "old-fashioned ways."

Best Yet Flower/Garden Club meeting held

The Best Yet Flower/Garden Club closed out 1985 with the completion of several successful community service and social projects.

Club members gathered clothing and non-perishable items for the Crisis Control Ministry. Several members presented the items and a cash donation to the ministry.

During their Christmas meeting, club members prepared flower arrangements and discussed plans to sell tickets for the Fourth District Garden Council's Annual Holiday House Tour.

The group's 1985 programs culminated with a Christmas party held at the home of Mildred Truesdell. Members brought covered dishes and exchanged gifts.

Virginia Stewart is club president.
