more than 6.6 percent. With a strong economic base of our own, we can hire black men, as well as black women, who can head family units and eliminate the year 2000 doomsday projections of our family destruction.

cept of the separation of church and state" does not really appear in the U.S. Constitution, but "is an essential part of the Soviet Constitution."

Such rhetoric, if implemented by any president, would lead to legal anarchy, at best. GOP officials, including many ultrarightists, shudder privately at the prospect of Robertson at the head of their 1988 ticket.

If Bush falters 1987, as many expect, look for Kansas Sen. Robert Dole to pick up most of his followers.

Dole has some obvious strengths. As Senate majority leader, he has media visibility; he has directed the Reagan administration's reactionary agenda through Congress. Dole also acquired some national campaign experience back in 1976 as the GOP vice presidential candidate.

Some Democrats are more fearful of Dole's potential candidacy than that of any other Republican, because of his reputation as a "compassionate conservative."

But this reputation is more illusion than reality. Last month, for example, Dole wanted to support liberal amendment which would have given $62 million in unextended Pentagon money to senior citizens' program. But when the roll call showed a narrow vote, Dole shelved his principles by voting no. The necessity to be viewed as heartless in the search for a Great White Hope was more important than the material needs of the elderly.

But if all of the above run into difficulties, other Republicans are waiting hungrily in the wings.

In late August, Reaganites in the western states met in Oregon to plot the presidential campaign of conservative Republican Sen. Paul Laxalt of Nevada. Other lesser Reagan epigones with presidential ambitions include Delaware Gov. Pete du Pont, former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, former Sen. Howard Baker of Tennessee and Colorado Sen. William Armstrong.

All desperately want the opportunity to become America's next Great White Hope.

political awareness during the many anti-apartheid actions on the campuses of the last two years. I've had the opportunity to participate in some of them, and was arrested at the University of California in Berkeley.

"I was impressed because the students really had it together. They are far better organized than we were. I remember often they would get arrested, and nobody thought about getting the bail together. And we'd have to deal with those things as an afterthought. But when the arrests around South Africa took place, everything was very well-organized -- the bail was there, the lawyers were there, the people who wanted to be arrested. So I'm impressed. I'm excited."
