'91 Wachovia Principal of the Year

Dr. John Schroeder, principal of Fairview Elementary School in High Point, was named 1991 North Carolina Wachovia Principal of the Year.

Schroeder received the award from L.M. Baker Jr., chief executive officer of Wachovia Bank of North Carolina, and Bob Etheridge, North Carolina Superintendent of Public Instruction. Wachovia and the Department of Public Instruction have co-sponsored the awards program since 1984.

Schroeder began his career in education in 1968 as a teacher in Asheville. In 1983 he was named principal of Fairview, the oldest and largest elementary school in the High Point system. Fairview's students come from the surrounding neighborhood of predominantly minority and lower income families.

Schroeder has been an advocate for his students to ensure that they are given the same educational opportunities as students attending other elementary schools. His doctoral dissertation on funding for the High Point schools resulted in changes in the way resources are allocated.

Realizing that many students coming into kindergarten were already deficient in language skills, Schroeder designed and implemented an experience-based developmental program for 3- and 4-year-olds. Fairview is now a pilot site for the state's preschool program. The school was also a pilot site for IBM's "Write to Read" program and houses an extensive computer lab.

As the state Principal of the Year, Schroeder received a cash award of $2,500 for his personal use and $2,500 for his school.

Literacy initiative holds kick-off event

The Literacy Initiative, a partnership of educators, civic groups, businesses, and individuals, held a luncheon in Winston-Salem on June 13 to increase awareness about the literacy crisis and to recognize people who have promoted adult literacy.

Dr. David G. Brown, a provost of Wake Forest University, addressed the more than 250 participants.

"Statistics about illiteracy should send shivers down the spines of corporations in this country," Brown said. He suggested that employers offer incentives like giving workers time off to participate in adult educational programs.

"Learners are the real champions- those who step forward and say "I want to learn."

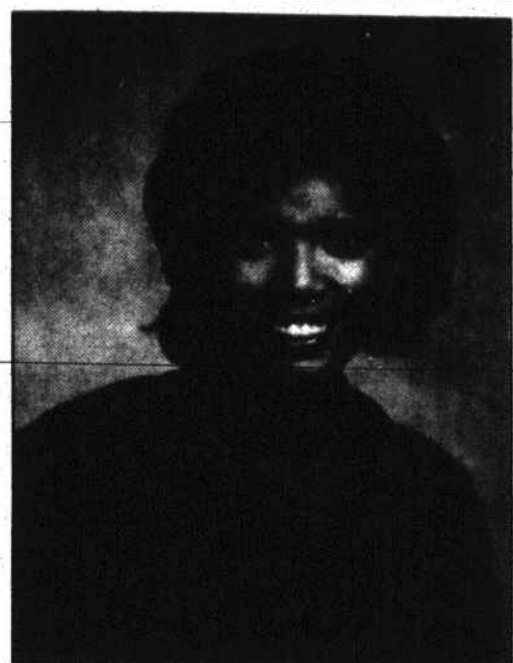

Seven awards were presented at the luncheon. Dovie Preston, age 70, received the student achievement award. Earline Parmon accepted the agency achievement award for LIFT (Learning Is Fun, Too).

Ann Gehlen, President of the Forsyth Literacy Council, received the leadership award.

Frank Dessell and Bess Hollingsworth received community service awards for their work as literacy volunteers. R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Company and Sara Lee Corporation received awards for their sponsorship of literacy programs.

The Literacy Initiative was formed by the United Way's Community Problem-Solving Committee and the critical issues committee of Leadership Winston-Salem. Jim Ferrell is chairman of the initiative's advisory board, and Sandra Pennington serves as executive director.

Local opportunities for learners are found at Forsyth Technical Community College, through the Forsyth Literacy Council, and the Pilot Mountain Baptist Association, both of which match tutors with individual learners or small groups.
