

Leaders Can Solve Conflicts within a Group

It's no problem in our society today to be involved in community, church and civic activities. We can be selective in choosing how involved and the group. However, the thing to remember in working with people is that sometimes you may have conflict. Regardless of what general goals and activities pursued, everybody does not always see things alike, which sometimes may create conflict.

Conflict stirs up our emotions and can be caused by our emotions. It occurs as a result of perception. How well we cope with conflict determines how well we get along with one another and how effective we are as leaders or members of a group.

To solve conflicts, the parties involved will need to be aware of their differences, discuss the differences, understand the differences and reasoning and decide upon a solution or compromise. Group involvement requires good leadership. There are some beneficial conflict effects that may occur. Some beneficial aspects of conflicts could include: increased learning, using
