Tanglewood Park, Golf or Cherokee Hunting Grounds

For the seventh year in a row, Tanglewood Park marks another chapter in its storied history by hosting the richest tournament on the Senior PGA Tour.

The park has been a fortress from Indians, the country estate of tobacco magnate William Reynolds, a home of horse racing champions and one of the nation's premier golfing attractions.

The Yadkin River frames Tanglewood's western boundary. The the Reynolds Course's 15 green, marking the approximate location of the fort.

The highest hill in the area, called Mt. Pleasant was the burial site for many of the pioneers. In 1809 a simple frame church was built near the graveyard, the old church remains a fixture of the park today and serves as a favorite site for many marriages. The cemetery has headstones dating back to the 1700s.

White settlers came to the area in the mid-1700s and found themselves squatting on Cherokee hunting grounds.

"Yattkin" an Indian word for Big Trees — at various times served the Sauras, Saponas, Tutelos, Keyauwee and Eastern Sioux tribes.

White settlers came to the area in the mid-1700s and found themselves squatting on Cherokee hunting grounds. Traders helped pacify the Indians, but the relative peace did not last.

About half the present acreage of Tanglewood was leased in the 1750s for five shillings and one peppercorn per year. Shortly thereafter, the tract was purchased for 80 pounds of sterling.

As remote as the wilderness must have been, those early settlers soon found their lives jeopardized by conflict between the British and French.

The French and Indian War put the settlers in peril. Indians, prompted by the French, began attacking English settlements. Roving bands of Indians attacked and killed settlers. In 1759, a fort was built on the property that is now Tanglewood, overlooking the river. Settlers fled there for protection and mutual defense.

Today a monument is located across from the Manor House near

In 1921, W.N. "Will" Reynolds purchased the property to establish a country home. The Reynolds family occupied and expanded a house that dated back to 1850. The Manor House is at the center of the park. With additional land purchases, Reynolds expanded the country estate to almost 1,200 acres.

Calling the land Tanglewood, Reynolds pursued his love for racing horses. Tanglewood became world famous as the home of Standardbred horses. Bred and trained here were such racing notables as Tar Heel, Solicitor and Mary Reynolds, who won the Hambletonian. Significant is the fact that the progeny of Tar Heel have won more than $21 million in purse money.

Horse racing is still evident at Tanglewood. Each spring the park attracts thousands of people to the annual running of the Steeplechase.

Following the death of Reynolds in 1951, the trustees of his estate converted Tanglewood into a public park which, today, provides almost unlimited recreational opportunities. But golf and the game's greatest names are the principal attraction during the week of the Vantage Championship.
