Maxine Gwynn, 1007 East 30th Street, and Marilyn Springs, 2900 Borg Road, received outstanding performance awards from the North Carolina Extension Service in Raleigh April 20.

Both women are program assistants for the county's Expanded Food and Nutrition Education program (EFNEP).

Springs was cited for her innovative teaching methods and her work with residents of homeless shelters and the residents of a half-way house for female ex-offenders. Gwynn was honored for encouraging many of her clients to continue their education and secure employment.

Gwynn and Springs have both worked with the EFNEP program more than nine years, notes Extension Home Economist Martha Isenberg.

The EFNEP Program was started 25 years ago to help limited families improve their nutrition. Last year program assistants across the state reached over 6,000 families and 5,399 youths.

Forsyth Tech's James Rousseau discusses plans for building potential satellite branch in East Winston.

and offer suggestions for the proposed campus. Since the first meeting was poorly attended, Forsyth Tech officials scheduled a second one.

A lot of confusion was also ended at the meeting. Many supporters were concerned that the Carver/Lansing site was in competition with a proposed site in Kernersville. But Forsyth Tech officials assured the group that both sites are being looked at separately.

County Commissioner Mazie Woodruff said the county gave Dudley Products funds to get its manufacturing business in Kernersville. In return, Dudley donated land to Forsyth Tech to build a campus.

"I say let's not be selfish, but let's do both because we can do both and it will not cost one thing in your taxes," Woodruff said.

Forsyth Tech President Bob Greene agreed. The college has $7.9 million in bond money and a possible additional $2.5 million that is being held by the state. He said he sees no reason why Forsyth Tech cannot construct a site in both locations.

The county purchased the 8-acre tract of land for the Carver/Lansing site and also plans to construct a public library there. But the library is a separate project from the campus construction.

J. Raymond Oliver, an East Winston dentist, said he was concerned the state might say construct one site now and another one later. He recommended the board make the Carver/Lansing site first priority.

Some residents expressed anger because they assumed that when a $560 bond referendum — $250 million going toward construction and enhancement of community colleges — passed in November, the Carver/Lansing site was a concrete deal. Now the construction of the campus will depend on the results of a feasibility study required by the state board of community colleges.

Marvin Allen, Forsyth Tech's dean of Business Technology, said the state began requiring the study of all potential institutions because some had been built too close to other operating institutions.

Portions of the feasibility study have been completed and Forsyth Tech officials are more than pleased with the results.

"The data is overwhelming," Allen said. "It is far exceeding our expectations."

Once the study is finished, a recommendation will be taken to the college's board of trustees for approval. Then, it will go to the state for final approval.

Greene said he doesn't expect any complications with the state.

"The state board would be very hard put to look at Forsyth County and say no you can't build where you have a need," he said.

Data from the study shows the Carver/Lansing site would be beneficial. A Lansing Drive fact sheet shows that in 1993 the college had 796 degree and diploma students and the average of continuing-education students was 751 per quarter.

Hal Tise, a teacher at Carver, said the site will be good for his students and will be a viable accessible option for those who will not attend a four-year institution.

Suggestions for curriculum included a possible officer-training program and new programs the college is planning to implement as well as the already popular programs on the main campus.

Greene said the plan is to move as rapidly as possible whenever the study is approved by the Forsyth Tech board and the state board.
