

Marian Friende Brower served as the faculty advisor of the 14th Street School Cheerleaders, among other responsibilities, around 1953.

account for the number of trophies his team won, he said, "I guess that a lot of the best athletes came from the East side of town."

H.R. Malloy ran track, but he had a reputation for "running too long in the same spot," he said with a chuckle. Malloy recalled how the young men would often gather under the tree.

Paul Ledbetter taught math and science, and he eventually became an administrator in the school system.

Rayvon Mitchell was a student at the school. Because he lived near the school, he could hear the demolition. He made sure that he took photographs of the school before its final demise, and he still has a brick from the original structure.

Henry Jones said the school was gone before he had time to get even a brick. Because he lived on the corner of 14th Street and Locust Avenue, he walked to school each day. This was very convenient for him as a coach and as a teacher.

When Melville Mauney attended 14th Street School as a student, Ulysses Reynolds was principal. However, when he taught there, J.D. Ashley was the principal. The contributions of Ashley to the community were never forgotten.

The Winston-Salem/Forsyth County Board of Education voted to rename Fairview Intermediate School for John Driver Ashley on June 28, 1982. The name became official July 1. The proposal for the changes was presented to the school board by the late Bernard Foy, music education coordinator.

"It was quite an honor for me and my family, one I will always cherish," said Mrs. Ashley. She said she is also thrilled that her husband's photograph currently hangs in the library of Ashley Middle School. She sees it as a testament to her husband's dedication to the youth of the community.
