

Urban Leagues officials earmark grant money

$75,000 grant will be used for race relations program

By T. KEVIN WALKER
THE CHRONICLE

Officials at the Winston-Salem Urban League are planning to use funds from a recently awarded grant to take a popular race relations workshop on the road.

The workshop — "Bridging the Gaps in Race Relations" — has helped thousands of city residents to become more racially tolerant over the past 10 years, officials say.

In recent years, demand for the workshop has spread beyond Forsyth County. In order to accommodate those demands, the Urban League applied for a grant from the Zachary Smith

Reynolds Foundation last August.

Last week, the Foundation awarded the Urban League $75,000. The money will be used to help defray the costs involved in taking the 20-hour workshop on a trek to towns and cities across the state.

"We've also gotten requests for the workshop from outside the state. The workshop has gotten very good feedback. It has helped to change a lot of (racial) myths that people have about each other," said Henrietta Hodge, the Urban League's director of program development.

The workshop involves a series of discussions dealing with various subjects—poverty, education, health care—where questions of race and culture can be easily interjected. Moderators for the workshop vary with the discussion topics.

The Winston-Salem Police Department, Forsyth County Sheriff's Department and instructors with the city-county school system have all taken advantage of the workshop during its decade-long run here in the city, Hodge said.

"The whole purpose of 'Bridging the Gap' is to promote an understanding of cultural differences," she said. "We have found that if a person has a better understanding of someone else's cultural, they are more tolerant and accepting."

Currently, the Urban League has plans to take the workshop to Wilmington, Wilson and Monroe. Expanding the workshop to other southern states is a possibility that the organization is also looking into.

This latest grant is the fifth awarded to the Urban League by the Z. Smith Reynolds Foundation, according to the Foundation's executive director Tom Lambeth.

Lambeth said for the past two decades, the foundation has made a concerted effort to focus on issues that impact minorities and women.

"We wanted to be a foundation that focused on North Carolina and all of its people...We saw that women and minorities needed special attention," Lambeth said.

Since its inception almost 65 years ago, the foundation has granted more than $257 million to organizations in counties throughout the state. Last year, the Foundation awarded 270 grants totaling $13 million.

A recent rash of hate crimes led the National Urban League to revive its efforts to bring about better race relations.

"We have always been impressed with their work, both locally and nationally," Lambeth said.

Winston-Salem Urban League Executive Director Dolores Smith developed the workshop in 1984 after she took a trip to Egypt.

She says the trip to Africa left her with many unanswered questions.

"I came to realize that I really didn't know who I was as an African American, and if I didn't know who I was, how could I expect whites to," Smith said.

In addition to fostering understanding between the races, Smith said the workshop has also helped African Americans gain a better understanding of themselves and their culture.

But building bridges over racial gulfs requires a willingness on the part of both blacks and whites, Smith says.

"You have to check the soil on both sides before you can build a bridge," she said.

Smith added that she would like the National Urban League and chapters throughout the nation to adopt the workshop.

Tuesday, Smith was in Raleigh where Gov. Jim Hunt announced yet another grant for the Winston-Salem Urban League.

The $25,000 Rite of Passage grant will enable the organization to train college students to become mentors to younger children who have had run-ins with the legal system.

it would be the smallest in the system. Marshall said if board members allowed the school to be converted, they would not be living up to their responsibility to provide students with the best education possible.

"Atkins has always been a substandard school. It was never as good as the schools on society hill...To even consider that proposal is a violation of your oath of office," he told the board.

A verbal sparring match erupted between Johnson and Marshall after the latter accused many of those who supported converting Atkins of abandoning it for greener pastures during its heyday.

Marshall said many elite blacks snubbed Atkins and sent their children to the posh Saint Anne's school and later to mostly white public high schools.

"After that (desegregation) suit, blacks knocked down the doors to get into Reynolds...Atkins was not all rosy," Marshall said.

Johnson — a lifelong resident of East Winston — retaliated by claiming that Marshall was not a native of the community and, therefore, uninformed about the matter. "Why did you come to this community," Johnson asked Marshall. "We didn't send for you."

After the meeting, Marshall said he came to the meeting to address his concerns to the board, not to argue with Johnson. But he says he hopes that he and Johnson will remain friends.

The community meeting the night before, was tame in comparison to the two men's spat. More than 300 hundred people attended the forum and listened as Marshall, Johnson and nearly 17 others gave their spin on the Atkins situation.

The idea for the forum came during a school board session on the proposal. The forum provide the board, which has been criticized for being too sheltered, with an opportunity to get up close and personal with the community they have alienated the most.

The two sides of the debate were easily recognizable, with many Atkins teachers and parents pushing to keep the school as is and Atkins High alumni lobbying for the change.

One Atkins teacher said changing the school to a high school, three years after it underwent a $9 million dollar renovation to become a "high-tech" middle school, would be problematic for the staff.

"This is the only newly renovated middle school in the inner city...Our teachers need a stable environment, (changing the school) would disrupt that environment," said Natalie Kimbrough.

Womble told the crowd that school officials have purposely avoided creating high schools in the black community.

"This is a conspiracy to keep our people from being knowledgeable and educated," he said.

By the end of the forum, it had become apparent that a new movement had developed, and had already, perhaps, gained more support than the original proposal. The movement involves a plan to build a brand new high school in close proximity to Atkins.

A proposal is currently before the board to build a new high school in the western part of the county. The school would help to alleviate overcrowding at West Forsyth High School, which could have more than 1500 students in few years. The school would also have a student body that is overwhelming white.

But many say the inner city has been neglected for much too long when it comes to new school construction. Speakers sent board members home with a clear message.

"Dr. (Donald) Martin, you must realize and understand, we want a high school in the East sector of this city," the Rev. Jimmie Lee Bonham said, addressing the superintendent.

Now, that the future of Atkins Middle is safe, Brown says she will support a new high school if it is determined that one is needed. Though she says a school in the Lowery Street area would be a more ideal location because it would be far enough away from Carver.

Johnson has also endorsed the plan. He says his endorsement isn't a change of heart.

"I've always wanted either a new school in this area, or to have Atkins back as a high school," he said.

To gauge if there is enough support in the East Winston community for a new high school, board members discussed the possibility of conducting polls in the area or holding more community forums.
