know his way around the CIAA. He played for North Carolina Central during the early 1970s and was an All-CIAA pick.
"I think I could possibly be better than my father," Davis said. "I'm sure he would love for me to be on the All-CIAA team."

But in order to do so the slender forward/center says she will have to improve on her 4.1 scoring average and 4.9 rebounding average.

Davis plans to work intensely at St. Paul's over the summer on ball handling and becoming more consistent on offense and on the boards while improving in the area of defense.

"The only way I can improve is to push myself," Davis said.

She also says the Lady Tigers can all find some areas to get better in to improve on their 6-20 record.

"We need to all improve," Davis said. "We need a lot of attitude adjustments and we just need to work hard."

The hardest aspect of college basketball for Davis hasn't been the playing intensity as much as learning her coaches system.

John Hill, the former assistant at Winston-Salem State University took over the Lady Tigers reins in the middle of this season but Davis continued to learn in practice and give her all on the court.

"I always give my team effort," she said. "Whether it's 10 seconds or 10 minutes, I go hard."

Davis posts up against Fayetteville State.

Davis brought that type of work ethic with her from North Forsyth High School.

Though she didn't start to play basketball until ninth grade she quickly learned the game. Her father never pushed the game on her at a young age but has been by her side ever since giving her advice and encouraging her along the way.

This has only helped her while adjusting to college basketball at St. Paul's College.

Davis says she has missed being away from her family and friends but has learned to adapt to the new surroundings.

"It was rough my freshman year but it's gotten better," she said. "The people at St. Paul's are nice. Even though it's a small town, it's a good place to get an education."

Davis also believes it's a good place to get a CIAA tournament title.

The move to Raleigh for the next three years is a big step up for the league. The arena seats some 23,000 fans for basketball. Of that total, 14,000 are in the lower arena. In Winston-Salem, only 6,000 seats are in the lower arena in the 14,500-seat Joel Coliseum.

"Raleigh is a totally different venue," he says. "It offers us another set of challenges. We're already feeling the effects of it. WRAL is covering this year's tournament live."

Kerry says there is some nostalgia involved with the conference and Winston-Salem. However, the CIAA has to be objective in its business approach.

"This is a job (as commissioner) and this is a business," he says. We're learning a lot of things about ourselves and the things we need to do. Sometimes change is good because it stirs up excitement.
