Lathun

As he delves into male infidelity on the CD with the tune "Would I Lie," you feel compelled to ask, "Would I lie?"

With some apprehension about doing his own thing, it was at the insistence of people already in the music industry that Lathun ventured beyond just producing and songwriting for others to concentrate on creating his own demo. This ultimately led to his current deal with Motown. Lathun said, "It's ironic that I'm from Detroit and I'm at Motown." It seems to be a match made in Hitsville!

Some of the standouts on "Fortunate" are "Didn't I," which is about a less than amorous affair, and "Would I Lie," in which Lathun reveals his guilt and what he does to keep his lover, even though he isn't worthy. If there are two voices that go together like Marvin Gaye and Tammy Terrell, it's "When Love Came In," featuring India.Arie. A wonderful chemistry emanates from the first note sung. It is simply arranged and beautifully executed. I hear remnants of Stevie Wonder's "All I Do" on this track. Maybe I'm wrong, but it's cool.

On "BBQ," the line "Give them what they want, anyway they want it" resonates in my head. Lathun is obviously doing that. What I love about "BBQ" is how its lyrics have me creating visual pictures about backyard cookouts, summertime jams and family reunions. Actually I found myself recalling a popular eating spot in downtown Manhattan near NYU. It was a hangout for, shall I say, cool, happening, up-and-coming hip-hop soul ingenues who went to dine on barbecue. Lathun would have been in his element there.

One should not expect anything but the best from Lathun. The lead single is absolutely a great song. It's excellent vocally, musically and has perfectly refreshing lyrics. Lathun sings it best when he says, "Like a diamond in the sky, a moment (immortalized) in time, a poetic silhouette for my life." What you hear is truly what it is, unplugged. It is all that and much more. Lathun knows who he is, but most of all he realizes how incredibly fortunate he is and it shows!
